Rethinking What It Means to Educate

La Salle's new provost reflects on national educational priorities as they impact on the university's journey into the 21st century

By Joseph F. Burke, F.S.C., Ph.D., '68

I still remember calling my parents last June to tell them that I had been offered the position of provost at La Salle. I had been working as a dean at a New England university, and my parents were delighted that I would be returning home to La Salle and Philadelphia. Still, it only took a few minutes for my Mother to ask, "What, dear, is a provost?" Mom's question has been asked of me many times since I've returned home, so it may be well to answer the question for the reader also. At La Salle, the provost is the vice president for academic affairs, the chief academic officer. Structurally, this means that all of the schools, academic departments, library, and academic service units report to the provost. More importantly, it means that the provost is responsible for assuring the "fit" between the education we provide and the long-term personal and professional needs of our students, as well as the needs of our city, region, and nation. What follows is a reflection on national educational priorities as they impact on La Salle's journey into the 21st Century. It is much less a blueprint than an invitation to dialogue among all of us who understand the value of a La Salle education and seek to maintain its position as "second to none."

Our Liberal Arts Tradition. Across our nation

educators are rethinking what it means to educate students for the future. At La Salle, like the majority of similar institutions, we have emphasized the enduring value of a liberal arts education. But what do we mean by "the liberal arts"? The term "liberal arts" comes from the Middle Ages (artes liberales), and refers to seven branches of learning: logic, rhetoric, arithmetic, geometry, music, astronomy, and grammar. Our modern understanding of the liberal arts is broader, including the modern disciplines of language arts (English and foreign languages and literature), philosophy, history, mathematics, science, the fine arts, and in the view of many, the social sciences and the more recently developed field of communication. But what relevance does all of that have in the age of quick-paced technology, pop culture, and the cult of the quick buck?

The most narrow view of a liberal arts education emphasizes information: what happened in 1066; what is the meaning of Plato's cave; who said cogito ergo sum; what is impressionism. But a liberal arts education is much more than that. The goal of a liberal arts education is liberation. Its goal is to free us from the stereotypes, prejudices, and transient products of our own age by connecting us with enduring ideas, values, and masterworks. It provides us with the ability to think critically, to engage in effective discourse, to enjoy creative works, and to place day-to-day life in a rich intellectual and spiritual context.

Even in our own day, few educators would disagree about the value of the liberal arts, but lurking beneath the surface of our affirmation of a liberal arts education is a significant argument about the actual content of what should be included in those four short years called college. For some, the typical content of the liberal arts curriculum in American colleges and universities is too narrow. They point out that it is almost exclusively Eurocentric, thus ignoring the rich heritage of other cultures, particularly those of Africa and Asia. Further, they argue that the growing numbers of minority students in our institutions need to feel connected to their own heritages, and beyond that, they contend that even majority students have much to learn and experience by expanding beyond a European-based curriculum. At the opposite end of the argument are voices that say that today's colleges and universities have already taken too many liberties with what should be taught, and they subscribe to the "Canon" of major Western works. These people often argue for a "Great Books" approach, and one critic has even prepared a catalogue of ideas, terms, and seminal works that ought to be experienced before one can be considered truly educated.

This issue of the content of a true education is not a new one in higher education. Rather, it is the continuation of similar arguments that have taken place over the centuries, including the most recent (and ongoing) discussion over integrating the voices of women in the content of various disciplines. On the surface, this argument about the content of education may seem merely "academic," but it is much more than an issue for professors to be concerned about. In our colleges and universities today we are shaping the values, aesthetics, and intellectual content of the educated citizens of the 21st Century. That thought keeps more than a few in academe awake at night.

Diversity at the Doorstep. Only the most casual observer is unaware of the enormous demographic changes in our city, region, and nation. Not long into the next century one third of the nation will be composed of minorities, particularly African Americans, Asians, and Hispanics, and the challenge to educate this increasingly diverse student body is a present preoccupation of American higher education. We have already referred to this issue in our discussion of the liberal arts. The curricular question can be framed in two different ways: (1) how do we bring Americans from different cultural heritages into the rich Western liberal arts traditions characteristic of our institutions; or, (2) how do we incorporate the cultural heritage of these diverse groups of Americans into the curriculum in our liberal arts colleges and universities for the benefit of all of our students. Those are very different questions, but they are not mutually exclusive. Is it possible to integrate the best of other traditions into our liberal arts curriculum while at the same time preserving the best of our traditional approach? That is a key issue facing higher education as it rounds out this century.

Of course, the issue of diversity goes far beyond curriculum. How do we build a social community on our campus that makes all students, regardless of their racial and ethnic background, feel secure, accepted, and challenged? In this regard, it is worth reflecting on La Salle's history. Like numerous other east coast Catholic institutions, La Salle built its reputation on its ability to successfully educate first generation college students. Most of these students were from families of modest means, and they came from a variety of ethnic backgrounds. Anyone associated with La Salle over the last one hundred or so years can remember this rich ethnic mix of Irish, Italians, Ukrainians, Poles, Germans, and others. These were the children and grandchildren of immigrants seeking success in the new world. With them we built a community that was welcoming, even comfortable, and the success of these students can be readily documented. Of course, La Salle remains committed to the future generations of these same peoples, but at the same time, our mission, drawn from that of the Christian Brothers, is to educate people of modest means and to bring into the American mainstream those who might remain outside of it but for the education we provide. Our history of accomplishment in this regard is impressive, and it compels us to make a La Salle education available to an even wider group of citizens. The increasing diversity in the nation's population provides us with an unprecedented opportunity to expand the La Sallian family. The challenge is to create a community where this next generation of students will feel as "at home" as past generations. These facts have important implication for us as we hire faculty and staff, revise our curriculum, and develop new programs, but it is a task to which we have committed ourselves.

Moral Education. For the most part, American higher education during most of this century has been squeamish about moral education. Catholic institutions, of course, have always emphasized moral education, albeit less by regulation than by exhortation and example. However, much has changed in the last few years in American higher education, and now there is a fairly clarion call to reinvest our energies in moral education. How best to do this is the question. Some institutions of a more fundamentalist bent have returned to the rigidity of the 1950's, but most institutions have chosen to look at curriculum and student programming for the answers. In addition to the more formal instruction in moral and ethical issues that takes place in religion and philosophy courses, you can see this new emphasis at work in the mission statement and curriculum of our Business School, in the recent conversations among faculty and students in our "Community on the Catholic Campus" discussion series, and in the ethics component in the new curriculum of the Communication Department. But perhaps the most dramatic place to see a new sense of responsibility based upon our religious and ethical values is in the area of student volunteerism.

Service Learning. The nation's campuses are alive with volunteerism in the form of community service. On our own campus, for example, over 400 students have been involved in formal programs to benefit the homeless, the elderly, disadvantaged youngsters, AIDS patients, the illiterate, low-income expectant mothers, and many other groups and individuals. The challenge facing American higher education in general, and La Salle in particular, is how to link this experiential piece of ethical education with the more formal curricular offerings. Nationally, this effort to establish links between the classroom and the community is referred to as service learning. Note the emphasis on learning in this expression. The old way of thinking about learning (you learn when in class or sitting in your room studying) is giving way to a more activist mentality. Clearly, we are not talking about replacing more traditional modes of learning. Rather, the issue here is how to integrate classroom learning with what the student learns from volunteer activities. Doing this requires a new way of thinking. Most of our institutions have two distinct branches: Academic Affairs and Student Affairs. In many institutions, the relationship between student affairs professionals and the faculty is one of reciprocal skepticism. Student affairs folks often feel under-appreciated while faculty feel under-consulted and under-involved in the lives of students outside the classroom. The impetus toward service learning is one avenue of common interest. The best institutions will forge productive partnership between these two committed groups of professional people, and the beneficiaries will be the students because their learning experiences will be integrated rather than compartmentalized.

Internationalizing Education. We have many political, economic, social, and even psychological reasons for anticipating the “global village” we were promised some years ago, and colleges and universities are determined to be part of it. From “study abroad” programs to elaborate international studies curricula, American colleges and universities are building links with educational, social, and political institutions throughout the world. While much of this activity has to do with enhancing the institution's attractiveness to applicants and making additional research opportunities available to faculty, there is also a growing awareness that international cooperation among educators is an important parallel to similar initiatives in the corporate and political communities. At La Salle, an international emphasis is increasingly evident in our curriculum, and new international study abroad programs to complement our European operations in Switzerland and Spain are under serious discussion. Institutionally, we have the advantage of links with Christian Brothers' institutions throughout the world, and we have only just begun to capitalize upon that important network.

Other Issues. Two additional issues deserve mention. The first has to do with life-long learning: how do we communicate to our students that learning is a life-long process that does not end when they graduate. Indeed, as we often remind students, commencement is a beginning rather than an ending. Related to that, how do we as an educational institution provide a welcoming home for the adult learner. Another issue: the new literacies. The women and men of the 21st Century will need a new level of literacy about science, technology, and the media. Here we are not simply talking about being able to write a letter on a computer or word processor. Our world is being revolutionized by scientific discoveries and technological advances, and the world is at our doorstep on television. What analytic skill and knowledge do the consumers of science, technology, and the media need? We simply must answer that question and change our institutions accordingly.

The La Salle Way. The re-thinking of what it means to educate is going on nationally, and in one sense, La Salle is simply a small part of those efforts. But, as you know, we always do things our way, the La Salle Way. That means that we always keep respect for the individual at the forefront of our discussion, it means that we do so in the light of our Catholic heritage, and we do so in an atmosphere of openness and collegiality. The challenges to La Salle in the 21st Century are formidable. But successfully facing serious challenge has been a hallmark of our 128 year history. We continue to believe that with our outstanding faculty, loyal alumni, spirited student body, and many good friends we will continue to be “second to none.”

Brother Burke became provost last July 1. He is former chairman of La Salle's Psychology Department and, most recently, dean of the University of Hartford's College of Basic Studies as well as special assistant to that university's president. He also served for two years as president of La Salle's Faculty Senate.

Man With Class

Doug Overton has wanted to be a part of the NEA a lot longer than he has wanted to be part of the NBA

By Frank Bilovsky, '62

Overton was a big hit as a student teacher at Widener School this spring.

Doug Overton always has had the proper perspective.

The La Salle University guard is a great basketball player, perhaps a No. 1 pick in the upcoming National Basketball Association draft.

But the greatest? Overton is the first to admit that he wasn't even the greatest player in his dorm room during the 1989-90 season.

Same with life off the basketball court. He has known what he wants to do with his life for a long time and has found the path to get there while avoiding the shortcuts.

He wants to be a teacher.

And he never stops learning.

He wants to be a professional basketball player, too.

But here's what makes him different from a lot of the other inner city youngsters with athletic and academic ability.

Doug Overton has wanted to be a part of the NEA a lot longer than he has wanted to be part of the NBA.

"A lot of guys come to college and they don't know what they want to take up, don't know where they fit in," Overton was saying a few days after his last Explorer team ended the season with a loss at Massachusetts in the first round of the National Invitation

"Doug is personable. He's articulate. He's genuine. He's organized."

Tournament. "For me, from the day I walked in my freshman year, I knew I wanted to be affiliated with something to do with kids.

"I thought elementary education would be the best thing because I wanted to work with kids at the early stages. That's a real important period for kids. High school is fine, but to help kids at even a younger age has to have a little more impact on them."

It was in Overton's pre-high school days when his idea of being a teacher impacted him for the first time.

He recalls that he was about 10 years old at the time. There was a boy in his neighborhood with a body that was older, a mind that was younger.

Mark Williams was a victim of Downs Syndrome and man's inhumanity to man.

"A lot of kids were alienated from him, but I kind of felt sorry for him," Overton explained. "At that young age, kids often don't feel those things for a kid who is special. Everybody else was teasing him while I was playing with him. I felt, you know, affection for him. And I think that kind of triggered my thinking about education. Nobody really knew it, but that was one of the main reasons why I had an interest in education and in working with kids."

Another reason was the part of Overton that everyone seems to recognize first—the fun-loving part.

"It's like you could put me in a sandbox at 6-3 with a bunch of little kids and I'll have fun," he said.

Ask the people who have worked with Doug Overton the closest and the combination of characteristics that they'll point out first are his ability to have fun while getting the job done.

Ask La Salle assistant basketball coach Joe Mihalich.

"He brings with him every day some things that a lot of people don't," Mihalich says. "He's the guy who makes everybody laugh. He's the guy who walks in the room and everybody gets happy. Every day, not only is he happy to be where he is, but he makes everybody else happy to be there. That's the quality that sets him apart from everybody else."

Ask Lionel Simmons, La Salle's College Player of the Year in 1990, candidate for NBA Rookie of the Year with the Sacramento Kings in 1991.

"I know Lionel misses Doug," Mihalich says. "Doug made Lionel happier every day. Doug makes it a fun thing—not in a silly way that keeps you from getting the job done. But he makes every day a fun day.

"He's just a pleasure to be around. He's got those qualities that make everyone not just a better player but make them enjoy themselves."

Ask Dr. Preston Feden, an associate professor of education who was one of Doug's first teachers.

"I'm not a big one in believing that teaching is just an innate thing, but he has certain personal qualities that lend themselves very nicely to a 'people' field—and teaching certainly is a 'people' field," Feden said. "Doug is personable. He's articulate. He's genuine. He's organized in his thinking.

"His freshman course, which I taught, we had reflective teaching lessons. He did his with a sense of humor, but focused on the task he had to do. Sometimes you get kids in those freshman level courses who are just silly and they think that's a good way to teach. And they don't know how to organize anything. But he was able to do that. In tests, sometimes it didn't come across. But in terms of actual teaching, he was all those things—articulate, good and appropriate sense of humor in the teaching situation, organized and focused."

Coming to La Salle from Dobbins Tech, Doug Overton was a question mark academically and athletically. The chances of a student from Dobbins succeeding in a college are slimmer than, say, a student with the same mind coming from a suburban high school like Abington or Cherry Hill East. The Dobbins student traditionally will do poorer on tests and will not have developed as strong study habits.

Overton emerged from the shadow of his former All America teammate Lionel Simmons (background) to win a host of honors in 1990-91 including the U.S. Basketball Writers, District I, Metro Atlantic Conference, and Big Five first teams and honorable mention All America.

his thinking"

But it didn't take long for Feden to realize that Overton was an exceptional person. Nor did it take long for the sixth grade students at Simmons School in the Hatboro—Horsham district where Overton did his student teaching in the first semester this academic year. Or at Widener School where he student-taught for the second semester.

"I was one of the first in the Education Department to have him as a student," Feden said. "And you know what? I did think he would make it because he's very articulate and he exuded a certain kind of confidence and you can just tell that he's bright.

"Academically there were a lot of demands put on people, so I'm not necessarily saying his grades reflected his potential. But my instincts over 22 years told me that he was going to make it—and not only that but that he was going to contribute in the field. He had an interest. He made comments in class that were insightful even at the freshman level. He just struck me not only as a person who probably would make it through, but who had a commitment to it. I've had students from private schools who haven't been as articulate and focused, frankly."

Feden has had plenty of students who needed more than four years to graduate. Doug Overton, despite the pressures of playing basketball at the Division I level, is scheduled to graduate with his class in May. It's an impressive achievement, especially considering that Overton also was able to make the same kind of progress on the basketball court as he made in the classroom.

"The (education) program's tough and it's a tribute to Doug that he was able to handle it," Feden said. "Along the line, I think he did get a good (primary and secondary) education, but I wouldn't say that he was polished. His educational background, plus a tug on his time by the basketball situation, caused him perhaps not to do as well in courses as he might have.

"But he's certainly done well enough. And as far as I know, nobody in our department ever cut him a break. What he did, he did legitimately on his own with only the help we would have given anybody else. But I made a very concerted effort from the get-go not to concede anything and not to give a B where a C was deserved or an A where a B was deserved. I've had him for three classes and he didn't always get the best grades. But what he got I knew was his. I knew he tried and I knew he cared and he would come in for feedback. He followed up, cared, was concerned about what he knew and what he didn't know.

"I think pretty much what you see in sports is what you see as a man and I think he's probably like that in everything. That's what I mean by genuine. I don't think he puts on any airs."

Overton likes to say that he learned that attitude from Simmons, his roommate two years ago when the Explorers were 32-2 and made the NCAA tournament for the third straight year.

"You never would have known that he was college player of the year," Overton said of Simmons. "He was so humble, so down to earth. Stick with Lionel, model yourself around him and you'll be OK. And I can say I did that.

"He stayed focused on school. He could have very easily just thought all basketball, but he didn't."

Neither did Overton. Not even this year when he became THE man.

He first exhibited athletic humility four years ago when he was honored as the Philadelphia Public League Player of the Year by the Markward Club.

"I would like to thank Brian Shorter for making this possible," he said at the banquet. Shorter had transferred from Simon Gratz to Oak Hill Academy in Virginia before his freshman year. Overton was implying he wouldn't have had a chance for the award if Shorter had stayed at Gratz.

Ironically, four years later, Overton is rated a better pro prospect than Shorter.

He had an outstanding career at La Salle. It would have been even more outstanding if he hadn't suffered a sprained ankle in practice the day before the City Series game in February against St. Joseph's.

At the time, Overton was averaging 24.2 points a game. He missed five games, played sub-par the next three, shot poorly against Massachusetts when he was finally at full physical strength and saw his average slip to 22.3.

Ever since he was 10-years-old, Overton has wanted to work with children at the early stages of their development.

"He's got everything you need—the speed, the quickness, the size, he knows how to play the game"

Even so, he finished his career as the sixth leading scorer in La Salle history with 1,795 points. He is the all-time Explorer leader in assists (671) and steals (277). He was three-time All Big Five and Metro Atlantic Athletic Conference player, a first-team Basketball Times All-East as a senior and a highly-rated prospect by NBA Director of Scouting Marty Blake.

Two years earlier, the thought of playing professional basketball hadn't crossed his mind. Nor had his coach, Speedy Morris, given it much of a thought.

"When we got him, he wasn't even that good a ball handler as I remember him from high school," Morris said. "He was certainly good enough to be Public League Player of the Year, but he had some things he had to work on and handling was one of them. But it just improved significantly each season. He played every day in the summer (with Bo and Hank), but he also worked by himself on the individual things he needed to be a player. All the great ones do."

Overton remembers the day someone told him that he had a chance to put the NBA in his future.

"Joe Mihalich told me at the end of my sophomore year," he said. "I had made a drastic improvement from freshman to sophomore year and Joe told me, 'If you continue to improve like you did from your freshman year to your sophomore year, you've got a chance to play in the NBA.' And I said, 'Joe, you've got to be kidding.'"

"But I really worked my butt off that summer, really worked to improve myself. And Lionel was getting a lot of attention. He was bringing a lot of scouts in. And I know they were saying, 'Hey if this guy keeps it up ...' But I still don't believe it."

Believe it, Doug! Mihalich surely does.

"He's a very well-rounded player," Mihalich said. "He's got everything you need—the speed, the quickness, the size, he knows how to play the game. But I think the one quality that sticks out more than anything else is that he makes everyone else better. That's what a point guard has to do."

"I think that in all honesty, that's why we struggled this year, because he couldn't be just a point guard this year. He had to score for us. He didn't have anybody to throw the ball to. You don't have to be a coaching genius to realize that. We just didn't have enough guys who could finish off the plays that he would create. But he's got everything you need. He's the total package."

On the court and in front of a class.

Dr. Robert Vogel was the La Salle professor who observed Overton's student teaching at Simmons school.

"He has such a draw about him, such a charisma," Vogel said. "People automatically like him because he puts on no pretense."

"He's not a natural academic teacher, but he's a natural person with people. And because of that, it's like any good teacher. If you're a good person and you respect other people and play to their strengths, you could even be a little bit weaker in the way that you teach and people will stay with you because they like you. The comfort level is very high."

"The kids loved him. When he finished up his last day, the day he was leaving for Japan, he had come back to return some papers. He brought some cupcakes that his mother had baked for the kids. He didn't have to do that but he did it for the kids. It was beyond the call of duty, but it showed how much he cared."

"He learned a lot from student teaching. I was very critical with him because I didn't want him to think he was going to get away with anything. And he respected that. His first two evaluations were extremely critical, but that's what he wanted and he was glad about that."

"He came here to learn because he wanted to be a teacher, and he played ball that way. He dealt with what he had to do and he never made any excuses."

And that was before the second semester at the Widener School for handicapped children, where the idea of not making excuses was reinforced for him.

"It's been a great experience," he said. "I really enjoy it. I get up every morning and get away from the basketball side of things, really get into the teaching side of things."

"I really feel that I'm helping the kids who are not as fortunate physically or mentally. Playing basketball, you take things for granted. But when I was down because of the way I played or frustrated because of the way my ankle felt, I'd go to Widener School and here are these kids. Some of them can't even walk. It kind of slaps you in the face, says, 'Wake up, these are the problems they've got to live with.'"

It's just one more current lesson for the future teacher.

Ed Lawless (above), the Explorers' wrestling coach, has recently been appointed strength and conditioning coach and director of the university's new Fitness Center located in St. John Neumann Residence Hall on the South Campus

(Photos by Martha Ledger)

The center, which opened in November, will eventually contain equipment from Paramount, Universal, York Barbell, and 15 Nautilus stations. Aerobic/cardiovascular facilities will be located on a newly-decked mezzanine level. Lawless and his staff are available to demonstrate appropriate techniques or training regimens for all weight-lifters from the novice to the expert.

An average of 300 men and women weekly are currently using the facilities in a bright, airy atmosphere, many of them employing the "buddy system" shown here. Varsity crew coach Pete Sigmund (in baseball cap, below) works with some of his rowers. Alumni are also welcome at the center which will be open until June 15. Hours beginning in September will be daily from 11 A.M. to 8 P.M. and on Saturday from 11 A.M. to 2 P.M.

From Student Congress to the Seven Seas

Sarah Green had rough sailing during her days as an Evening Division student. Now she's teaching computer literacy on luxurious cruise ships

By Robert S. Lyons, Jr., '61

Sarah Green's education at La Salle University not only changed her life, it has literally sent her cruising around the world with one of the most unique part-time jobs imaginable.

When she's not at home in San Jose, California running her own computer training and office automation consulting firm, Green, '75, can often be found sailing one of the seven seas offering computer literacy courses to people vacationing on luxury liners like the Queen Elizabeth 2, Rotterdam, Noordam, and Nieuw Amsterdam. She's made 28 cruises in the last six years. Her 1,200 students have included people like Pulitzer Prize-winning playwright John Patrick (Tea House of the August Moon) and her colleagues on the leisure/entertainment staffs of the ships have been people like Flip Wilson, Dave Brubeck, and Van Johnson.

"The skills that I learned at La Salle have taken me right through life," says Green, who majored in psychology, wrote for The Evening Collegian, and became the first woman to serve on the Evening Division's Student Congress. "If I had not encountered La Salle, certainly I would not have been the person I am today. The support there was just marvelous. La Salle turned my whole life around and it gave me a real feeling of success."

Things weren't always so marvelous for Sarah Green. She came from a background that was "somewhat disadvantaged" as a youngster. When she started at La Salle at the urging of a friend in 1969, she had just been through a bad marriage. "I was kind of down and out in life. Things just were not going right." Sarah also wasn't sure if she was college material when she enrolled for an English course in the Evening Division. Six weeks later, she knew. The instructor, Vincent Kling, said that she was being transferred to a higher level course because she had exceeded all expectations. "That was the real turning point in my life," recalls Green. "It gave me all the confidence that I needed."

Green has offered computer training on cruises that have ranged from a week to 30 days.

Green's "Basic Introduction to Computers" course typically ranks on the popularity charts up there with trap shooting, dance instruction, and cooking classes.

Before long, Sarah was not only excelling in the classroom, she was traveling all over the country representing Student Congress. But there were still roadblocks. Her elderly parents were ill and she was working full time as a single parent, putting herself through school, keeping a house, and taking care of two generations. One person who was very helpful on a couple of occasions was Brother Jack Dondero, professor of psychology. "He had to put me back together one day when I went into his office totally distressed," she recalls. "I'll never forget it." Shortly afterwards, she lost her job with the federal government after 17 years when the U.S. Army Electronics Command in Philadelphia was phased out. Sarah then transferred to full-time day school and graduated magnum cum laude two years later. Her son, Kevin, became the first non-spouse to be awarded one of the university's Ph.T. (Putting Her Through) award. Today he's a successful video photographer, working with some of the top model and talent agencies in San Jose.

Green earned a master's degree from Temple University, then went to work for Minneapolis Honeywell in nearby Fort Washington as the company's first female purchasing agent. Two years later, in 1978, Sarah relocated to San Jose as purchasing manager for American Microsystems, Inc., a semi-conductor manufacturer. Not long afterwards, she was asked to develop a computer training program for all employees. The only problem: she knew absolutely nothing about computers.

"It was just like I was back at La Salle," Sarah recalls. "Every semester you've got new books, new teachers, new subjects, new challenges." For Green, it was just another "term project." One day she was reading the manual, the next day she was teaching employees. By the time she left to start her own business in 1983, Sarah had trained 200 people—a task that her psychology degree from La Salle helped prepare her.

"I am helping people enter the age of technology and they're terrified," Green explained. "It's a big psychological problem for them. Some of these people never thought that they had the skills for computers. They certainly didn't have the interest. Using my psychological background, I went in, found the right approach, and had them totally enjoying it."

Sarah's other career aboard cruise ships developed quite by accident. She happened to read in Trove and Leisure magazine that the QE2 had been refurbished after the Falklands War and one of its new innovations was a Computer Learning Center for passengers who had plenty of spare time on their hands. A few phone calls later, Green was in touch with Southampton, England. She found out that the Cunard Line had an opening for another instructor and within two months she was on her way to New York for her first transatlantic crossing. "Talking about being out on a limb," Green said. "I had never been on a cruise ship—any ship—in my life. I had no idea if I would get sea sick. And I had no experience with IBM computers."

Everything worked out fine, however. One day at sea, Green heard that another cruise line was considering introducing similar computer training classes. As soon as Sarah reached shore, she telephoned the representative of the other shipping company on the East Coast. She was told that he would be interested in using her and immediately suggested getting together. "I think it would be nice if we got to know each other," said Green. "He said, 'Sarah, that's all right. I already know what you look like.' Now we're 3,000 miles apart so I said, 'How could you possibly know what I look like?' He said, 'Remember when you boarded the QE2 in New York? You came dashing into the cruise director's office and you almost ran over somebody.' And I said, 'With a beard?' And he said, 'Yes, that was me.' Isn't that incredible? I said, 'O my God! Was that you?' because I remember dashing into that room. I threw the door open and there was a man on the other side of it. And I said, 'Oh, I'm sorry! I didn't mean to hurt you.' He said, 'not only that. I attended your classes. You're great!' If I had known that I was auditioning, I would have died."

When Sarah graduated magnum cum laude from La Salle in 1975, her son, Kevin, became the first non-spouse to be awarded one of the university's Ph.T. (Putting Her Through) certificates.

Needless to say, Sarah had herself dozens of new bookings. She now works for four different cruise lines—Cunard, Holland America, Regency, and Sitmar—and is often the first person contacted when a cruise ship operator sets up a new computer training program. She handles all the logistics, figures out the best way to run the program between certain ports, and oversees the operation of the computer room that often is occupied 24 hours-a-day. Her "Basic Introduction to Computers" course typically runs for an hour-and-a-half each day and finds itself right up there on the popularity charts with trap shooting, dance instruction, or cooking classes. "At the beginning, computers were installed on ships as an experiment or on a trial basis," Green recalled. "We hoped that the cruise directors would use them to encourage other passengers. Now we're chasing the staff off to let passengers have their turns."

Green's cruises have ranged from a week to about 30 days. She spent two monthly segments as part of world cruises, once sailing from Peru to the South Pacific and, another time, going from Los Angeles to Hawaii, China, Thailand, and Singapore. She's been to Alaska several times and sailed through the Panama Canal only two days before the American invasion of Panama during the Noriega crisis. She disembarked from another cruise as it approached Libya three days before the United States bombed Khadafy's stronghold. Two years ago she was stricken with a life-threatening intestinal blockage while aboard the QE2 in the middle of the Caribbean. The ship made an emergency stop in Barbados where she spent eight days "hospitalized and totally traumatized in third world conditions."

Last year, on a return cruise, Sarah revisited the hospital, which she remembered as a "shack," in Barbados. "Now the hospital had been completely rebuilt into a new modern facility," she recalled. "I went back, met with the doctors, and staff, and thanked them for literally saving my life."

The only drawback, says Green, is the fact that the trips take valuable time away from her own consulting firm. "I'm not doing as well as I would like because each time you're away for a few weeks or a month, you start losing a little ground. I haven't traveled as much recently because I'm concentrating on promoting my business."

All in all, though, Sarah says that her career has worked out phenomenally well.

"My world has expanded so greatly largely because of my La Salle education," she said recently. "La Salle prepared me for what has turned out to be a wonderful life."

"We Start by Gripping a Baseball"

Almost every development in American history has been perfectly mirrored by our national pastime

By Dr. John P. Rossi, '58

Mounted police help with crowd control as fans clamor for a "bleacher seat" on the roof of one of the homes on 20th street across from the right field wall at Shibe Park during a World Series appearance by the old Philadelphia Athletics in 1930.

"Whoever wants to know the heart and mind of America had better learn baseball."

Jacques Barzun's oft-quoted remark is as true today as it was 35 years ago when he first made it. Baseball is not just part of our history; it is intimately entangled in our past. Since its emergence as a serious sport in the 1840s baseball has almost perfectly mirrored every development in American history.

Baseball began as an effort by athletic types, mostly successful middle class WASPs, to create for the young

United States a sporting environment similar to that provided by cricket in England. The first American baseball clubs were precisely that: clubs where people of a like mind could recreate and socialize.

Baseball developed in the generation before the Civil War largely because of a plan that systematized the sport drawn up in 1846 by Alexander Cartwright (not Abner Doubleday who had nothing to do with baseball) a member of the New York Knickerbocker baseball club. Cartwright's rules, called the New York game, caught on and rapidly spread throughout the country because they were logical and easy to master. Such features as three outs for an inning, bases ninety feet apart and nine players a side were all part of Cartwright's rules. This version of baseball soon swept aside all other variants of bat and ball games that had been played in America since the colonies were founded.

The Civil War saw the game played by soldiers on both the Confederate and Union side. Photographs have been found showing soldiers playing a recognized version of baseball. According to Ken Burns, creator of the much heralded series on The Civil War and now working on a similar documentary on the history of baseball, the sport's growing appeal was part of the country's attempt to forget the Civil War and find a peaceful game that would unite the nation.

The late nineteenth century laid the foundation for the final emergence of baseball as "America's Game." As the country became more urbanized due to the Industrial Revolution, baseball switched from a rural game to a sport played in, and dependent upon support, in the cities. The game left the open cow pastures for ball parks built in the heart of the city. By the 1870s leagues that bear resemblance to modern ones came into existence and schedules were played that also are similar to a modern one.

Baseball also changed in another dramatic way in the 1870s. What began as a sedate, club-like form of recreation was transformed into a professional sport with highly paid athletes. As city teams became competitive they tried to lure the best amateur players to their teams by paying them to play. Baseball was a fully professionalized sport by the 1870s with the highest paid player, Harry Wright of the Cincinnati Red Stockings, making $2,500 a season, a huge sum in those pre-inflation years.

The sport was further defined in the 1870s by a variety of changes. The box score was invented. Gloves were introduced and quickly became commonplace making fielding more reliable. The catcher began wearing a mask that enabled him to move closer to the batter and take the pitch on the fly rather than a bounce. Fielders took positions that closely resemble modern positioning. The bunt had been invented and runners began to slide into bases.

The 1870s also witnessed another significant change in the nature of baseball—the ethnic makeup of the players changed. Among the best players in the game were the immigrant Irish. For the first, but not last, time baseball showed that it could contribute to social mobility in America. The Irish broke through initially in the 1870s and by the 1890s they constituted 1/3 of all the major league players. WASP holdovers like Adrian 'Cap' Anson now had to share the spotlight with Irish players like Tommy Bond and Tip O'Neil. The first great Irish-American superstar was Mike 'King' Kelly, a huge multitabled player who could hit, run, and throw with the best in baseball. His daring base running gave rise to one of baseball's first (but not last) chants—"slide, Kelly, slide." It is no accident that when Ernest L. Thayer came to write his enormously popular poem about baseball in 1888 that he named his hero, Casey. It is also sad to note that Kelly died young of the effects of heavy drinking establishing a pattern of substance abuse, especially alcoholism, that still plagues baseball today.

The Irish came to so dominate baseball in 1880s and 1890s that people began referring to the 'Irish game,' meaning a brand of rough-house baseball, best or worst exemplified by the Baltimore Orioles. Led by Irish-Americans like Willie 'Hit em where they ain't' Keeler, and John McGraw, the Orioles played a new and exciting style of baseball but one vastly different from the gentlemanly game of previous years. The McGraw-led Orioles looked for every edge—they used brush-back pitches, baited umpires, tripped opposition runners when the umpire wasn't looking and used their spikes to intimidate the infielders. They fought on the field and off with their opponents leading to fears by sports-writers that this type of play would scare fans away. Instead the fans loved the new brand of baseball. The game became enormously popular with crowds of 3,000 to 4,000 being commonplace and the best players becoming lionized. Sliding Billy Hamilton, Keeler, McGraw, Amos Rusie, 'Kid' Nichols and Ed Delehanty became household names in the '90s.

The game achieved its final definition in the 1890s just as the nation grew more diverse because of immigration from southern and eastern Europe. Baseball served to help unify the nation by providing a game that everyone could play. It served to validate the democratic ideal. Mark Twain, a superb judge of American values, recognized this appeal. "Baseball," he wrote, "is the very symbol, the outward and visible expression of the drive and push and rush and struggle of the ranging, tearing, booming nineteenth century."

In 1893, after various experiments with pitching distances, a rule was passed placing the pitchers mound 60' 6" from home plate. No one is exactly sure why this figure was settled on. It appears to have been the result of chance but when combined with over-hand pitching and a raised mound it meant that pitching could keep hitting under control. Three hits every ten times up now became a sound measure of offense. A workable tension between hitting and pitching had been reached. It continues today despite all kinds of tampering with the game—souped up baseballs, the ban on trick pitches, artificial turf and that most odious concept, the designated hitter.

As the American public had more leisure time available, attendance rose and baseball seized a virtual monopoly of the sporting dollar. Baseball had no serious sporting competition. Boxing was popular but its brutality limited its appeal. College football was just getting started and basketball had only recently been invented. Baseball's monopoly led to the influx of sports entrepreneurs who were fans but also were interested in making money out of the game. Former players like Al Reach and Albert Spalding became highly successful manufacturers of baseball equipment. In 1877 Spalding founded the profitable SPALDING BASEBALL GUIDE, one of the first books devoted exclusively to baseball statistics. He was the first, but not the last man, to become a millionaire from the exploitation of baseball. Rich businessmen, many of them brewers, bought baseball teams and hibe Park was later re-named Connie Mack Stadium and served as the home of the Athletics until 1954 when they moved to Kansas City and the Phillies until the end of the 1970 season. Veterans Stadium opened the following April.

used them to market their products, establishing a trend that has lasted to the present day. This helps to explain the proliferation of German names among the early baseball owners.

Early in the 20th century, just as Theodore Roosevelt led the nation in a war against the Trusts and monopoly, baseball also lost part of its monopoly. The National League which had survived competition from a variety of challengers in the 1880s and 1890s was confronted by a new threat. Ban Johnson, a former journalist and avid baseball fan, organized a new league, the American, in 1901. He put teams into many National League cities among them Philadelphia, Chicago, Boston, St. Louis and eventually New York. By 1903, 16 teams were in place and no new franchise moves were made for 50 years, a degree of stability not likely to be matched again in the world of sport. Players took advantage of the situation and jumped teams. As a result salaries rose, new team rivalries developed and fans all over America clamored for a playoff between the winners of the two leagues leading to the first World Series in 1903. Despite hesitancy on the part of the National League owners, the idea caught on and became a regular feature of baseball in 1905.

News coverage of baseball escalated in the years before World War I until the sports page was virtually monopolized by baseball. Even in the off season baseball stayed alive through the so-called 'hot stove league' where writers and fans argued about the past season and plotted trades for the coming campaign. Around 1915 a generation of superb journalists led by Ring Lardner, Damon Runyon and Grantland Rice transformed the writing about baseball from the naive and enthusiastic to the serious, the witty and the analytical. Interest in the sport continued to expand as new heroes emerged to dominate the game: Napoleon Lajoie, Honus Wagner, 'Rube' Wadell, 'Wahoo' Sam Crawford. The first two decades of the century also saw the breakthrough of another ethnic group, this time the German-Americans led by Wagner, Herman 'Germany' Schaefer, and an amiable supertalent from Baltimore named George Herman 'Babe' Ruth. The German and Irish contingent of players was large but they had to share center stage with the southerners, led by Ty Cobb, the 'Georgia Peach,' 'Shoeless Joe' Jackson and college men fresh from campuses all over America, best represented by Christy Mathewson, Eddie Collins and 'Gettysburg' Eddie Plank.

By the end of World War I, baseball began to experience stiff competition for the public's money from college football and boxing. While having to share popularity with Red Grange, Notre Dame, Man O' War and Jack Dempsey, baseball more than held its own in the 1920s largely because of the dramatic appeal of Babe Ruth. Ruth saved baseball in the 1920s by distracting the public's attention from the Black Sox scandal of 1919. More importantly, he also transformed the game from one of strategy—moving runners, hit and running, stealing bases—into a game of long ball. In 1920 Ruth hit 54 home runs. For some idea of how astounding that figure was consider that it was 25 more than anyone had ever hit before and his total was greater than the total home runs of fourteen of the remaining fifteen teams in the major leagues that season. The ball was made livelier, batters began to swing from the end of the bat and the homerun became a recognizable part of baseball for the first time. Fans responded by turning out in record numbers to see him and the new brand of baseball. Attendance figures in the 1920s were 37 million higher than the previous decade.

The 1920s also witnessed another innovation—radio broadcasting of baseball. Slow to catch on at first because some owners feared that fans would stay home and listen to the game, radio actually created new fans, including women, who could learn about the game at home. After broadcasting the World Series in 1922, Graham McNamee found himself famous and got 17,000 letters from fans praising his description of the game. The St. Louis Cardinals and Chicago Cubs discovered that widescale radio broadcasting all over the Midwest created a new loyalty that transformed into added gate receipts as fans journeyed hundreds of miles to see major league baseball. Over the next twenty years a whole new generation of fans were tutored in baseball expertise and 'lingo' by announcers who became household names: Red Barber, Mel Allen, Jack Brickhouse, and Byrum Saam among them. Radio not only spread the popularity of baseball but eventually brought in more money to the owners. Along with new stars like Joe DiMaggio, Bob Feller, and Ted Williams, radio also helped baseball survive the hard times during the great depression.

In the late 1920s and early '30s, baseball also resolved a number of problems that had plagued the sport over the years. Led by Branch Rickey, the Cardinals developed the first farm system to provide a steady supply of new talent. By the late 1940s there were 58 flourishing minor leagues with over 500 teams playing from class D up to triple A. Last year there were just 18 minor leagues functioning. More importantly for the public, baseball in the 1930s created the first and most successful sports Hall of Fame in Cooperstown, New York. It soon became a shrine worthy of any saint or patriotic hero with thousands of fans visiting it every year.

During World War II, baseball almost collapsed as 90% of the players went into the military. The game was left to greybeards, teenagers and those with a 4-F rating. As a result its quality suffered. In 1945 Snuffy Stirnweiss of the Yankees won the batting title by hitting .309, the lowest average in almost forty years. The American League home run title in 1944 was won by Nick Etten with 22. When the St. Louis Browns won their only pennant in 1944, they had 18 players on the roster who were 4-F. The game only survived because President Roosevelt believed that baseball would serve to build morale in the nation and the public needed something to take its mind off the war.

The war also established the primacy of night baseball. First introduced by Larry McPhail in 1935 in Cincinnati, the concept was slow to catch on. The government preferred night baseball during the war because it provided leisure activity for war workers while not interfering with their jobs. Within five years of the war's end every team in the majors except the Cubs would adopt night baseball and begin to play a greater part of their schedule under the lights.

The two decades following the war were the most important for baseball since the game was formalized in the 1870s. Facing increasing competition for the leisure dollar from other sports especially college football, baseball's adjustment took many forms. The owners successfully promoted baseball as the family game, the one sport that everyone could enjoy and understand. Most significantly, it ended the color bar by allowing blacks into the majors for the first time since the 1880s. Led by Jackie Robinson, blacks like Willie Mays, Larry Doby, Ernie Banks, Don Newcombe, and Hank Aaron not only improved the quality of baseball but also helped increase its popularity. The blacks were followed into baseball by the Latin players, a source of talent that only a handful of teams had tapped in the past. Roberto Clemente, the Alou brothers, and Orlando Cepeda played a new and exciting style of baseball. Attendance figures rose by 30 million in the 1950s and 56 million in the 1960s.

Along with ending the color bar, baseball incorporated television into the game in the 1950s. Again there were fears that television would keep fans at home. Instead as with radio it created new fans especially kids who discovered a new generation of heroes like Mays, Mickey Mantle, Sandy Koufax, Robin Roberts and Stan Musial.

Showing that it could still reflect the way America was changing, baseball in the 1950s began moving franchises around: the Boston Braves to Milwaukee, the St. Louis Browns to Baltimore, and the A's to Kansas City. Then in 1958 baseball went transcontinental by shifting two successful franchises, Brooklyn and the New York Giants to Los Angeles and San Francisco. The Dodger franchise became the most prosperous in baseball, setting the standard that other teams sought to copy. For the last thirty years the Dodgers have drawn more fans than any other team in baseball.

Early in the 1960s, baseball added new teams for the first time since the turn of the century. Eventually it expanded beyond the continental United States by establishing teams in Canada, including highly successful franchises in Montreal and Toronto. All of these factors showed that baseball could adopt to the modern world and at times could demonstrate imagination in the face of challenges from other professional sports like football and basketball.

Baseball even survived the abolition of the reserve clause in 1975 which for a century had bound a player permanently to his team. Predictions of disaster from owners and writers proved premature as the game thrived from the mid-1970s on. Despite escalating salaries and players acting like prima donnas, the sport looks safe for the future despite the worst efforts by greedy owners and players.

The immense popularity of baseball is rooted deeply in our culture. Baseball had long validated the American Dream. It is the only sport that has spawned serious literature. Beginning with Ring Lardner's You Know Me Al stories through Bernard Malamud's The Natural, and Mark Harris' Bang the Drum Slowly, a rich and complex baseball literature has emerged, one that reflects the hold the game has on our psyche. In recent years this genre has been joined by superb films such as Robert Redford's version of The Natural, Bull Durham, and Eight Men Out.

Every few years I offer a course in the summer dealing with the complex relationship between baseball and America's history. It is an easy course to organize because so much excellent material is available. The level of serious writing about baseball led by David Voight, of Albright, and Harold Seymour as well as the work of brilliant journalists like Roger Angell, of the The New Yorker, has made it simple to connect developments throughout baseball's history with crucial changes in America's past.

The student leaves the course understanding a great deal about how the professionalization of sport developed, about the workings of racism in one area of American society and about the complex economic and social changes that are involved in sport. Baseball is a perfect microcosm for what happened in America over the past century and a half. It is in our very bones.

As Jim Bouton once quipped, "we start by gripping a baseball and end up being gripped by the game."

Dr. Rossi, a professor of history, has written extensively about his specialty, modern British and Irish history, along with work on the career of George Orwell, World War II, and baseball. He spoke last June at the annual conference of "Baseball and American Culture" at Cooperstown.

Nursing Program Offers Graduate Course Option

La Salle University's Department of Nursing now offers an option that enables undergraduate students to take graduate level courses while still pursuing their bachelor of science in nursing degree.

Undergraduate students who qualify for the program that began in January may take up to six graduate credits in one of the three areas of specialization leading to a master of science degree in nursing offered by La Salle.

The three tracks available in La Salle's Graduate Nursing Program are Adult Health and Illness Nursing, Community Health Nursing, and Nursing Management Administration.

Courses are offered at La Salle's main campus at 20th st. and Olney ave., in Philadelphia, and in Bucks County at Archbishop Wood High School, York and Street roads, Warminster.

Dr. Marylou K. McHugh, R.N., assistant professor of nursing, emphasized that the program is not for everyone, but added that the new option offers a number of advantages for the "really bright" students, especially if they have already decided as undergraduates their future area of specialization in nursing.

"This option will enable some students to speed up their graduate work by as much as a year," explained Dr. McHugh. "Not only that, but, graduate level courses are often much more stimulating for the gifted students."

Dr. McHugh said that this program "adds a new dimension to education at La Salle" because it is believed to be the first time that La Salle undergraduates have been permitted to take graduate level courses.

La Salle's RN/BSN curriculum, which is one of the largest programs of its kind in the country, is designed for graduates of Associate Degree and Diploma nursing programs who hold the R.N. license.

La Salle's M.S.N. degree program prepares nurses for advanced practice as clinicians and administrators in traditional and non-traditional settings.

La Salle Student Named to USA TODAY All Academic Team

La Salle University senior Andrea Kelly, of Philadelphia, has been named by USA TODAY as a member of it's 1991 "All-USA College Academic Team", which salutes the "best and the brightest" students from across the country.

Kelly, a biology major with a mathematics minor, was selected as one of only 60 students nationwide who made one of the newspaper's three "academic teams". USA TODAY used the word "team" to show that academic skills deserve at least equal recognition to athletic honors.

Kelly, who has a GPA of 3.97, was nominated by La Salle professors because she excelled not only in scholarship, but in leadership roles on and off campus.

One of the key elements for selection was a student's outstanding original academic or intellectual product, and the student's ability to describe that endeavor in a written form. Kelly was chosen, in part, for her research on the resistance of cancer cells to a specific chemotherapeutic agent. The research was performed while she worked in the pharmacology department at the Fox Chase Cancer Center in northeast

La Salle's Department of Nursing has been awarded a $4,371 grant from the Delaware Valley Chapter of the March of Dimes. It will be utilized to expand the university's health promotion services to include pregnancy testing for low-income women in the Germantown area. Here Dr. Patricia Gerrity (right), associate professor of nursing at La Salle, discusses the grant with Dottie Schell, chairperson of the March of Dimes Health Professional Advisory Committee.

Philadelphia during the summer of 1990.

At La Salle, Kelly is the chairperson for the Senior Gift Committee, which presents a parting gift from seniors to the university. She is also a member of La Salle's Homeless Committee, the Alpha Epsilon Delta Pre-Medical Honor Society, and the Alpha Epsilon Alumni Honor Society.

Kelly is a member of La Salle's Campus Ministry Liturgy Planning Committee and she was recently named to Who's Who Among Students At American Universities and Colleges. She is a past member of the university's Justice Week Committee.

As a member of La Salle's Homeless Committee, Kelly volunteers for food and clothing drives. She has participated in Project Appalachia, a student volunteer organization where members spend their spring break performing home repair/renovation and farm work in the Appalachian area.

This year Kelly spent her spring break participating in the Campus Ministry's "Week of Hope," where she worked at a number of sites throughout Philadelphia including Project Rainbow, which cares for children and homeless mothers, and Women of Hope, which works with emotionally disturbed women and victims of spouse abuse.

Upon graduating in May, Kelly plans to attend medical school.

USA TODAY used a panel of nine educators to select the students for their outstanding blend of scholarship, initiative, creativity and leadership, and their desire to use their talent to help others.

Two Seniors Awarded W.W. Smith Grants

Two La Salle University seniors have been awarded $5,000 scholarships each from The W.W. Smith Charitable Trust to help finance their education at La Salle for the 1990-91 academic year.

The recipients are Charles Snyder, III, a senior accounting major who lives in Maple Shade, NJ, and Bridget E. Beynon, a senior elementary and special education major who lives in Factoryville, PA.

Snyder is a member of La Salle's Beta Alpha Accounting Society, the Accounting Association, and the Association for Business Excellence, as well as a participant in various intramural sports activities.

A volunteer for income tax assistance, Snyder is also a volunteer coach and referee for his home-town soccer team. Upon graduating, he plans to pursue his master's degree in taxation or possibly attend law school.

Beynon is a member of La Salle's Conflict Mediation Team, which attempts to settle disputes between students and/or faculty. She is also a resident assistant in one of the university's dormitories.

She has tutored at Building Blocks Child Development Center on La Salle's campus, at Widener Memorial School and Logan Elementary School, both in Philadelphia.

Beynon has volunteered at Our Lady Help of Christians Church in Abington, where she assisted with church activities and fundraisers. This semester she is student teaching at Shawmont Elementary School in Roxborough.

Upon graduating, Beynon plans to pursue a career in teaching or special education in an urban or suburban school near the Philadelphia area.

The W.W. Smith Charitable Trust scholarships to Snyder and Beynon brings its total amount of various grants and scholarships awarded to La Salle University to $86,000 for the current year.

"All of us at La Salle deeply appreciate the many forms of support our students have received over the years from the W.W. Smith Charitable Trust, and we are especially grateful for having the opportunity to participate again this year in the W.W. Smith Scholarship Prize Program," said Dr. Fred J. Foley, Jr., the university's vice president for development.

Recipients of the W.W. Smith grant are selected on the basis of academic distinction, financial aid, high personal character, involvement in on-campus extracurricular activities and/or off-campus community service projects and leadership.

The W.W. Smith Charitable Trust, the third largest private foundation in Philadelphia, awards $6 million in grants annually in the Delaware Valley Region to support: medical research into cancers, heart disease and AIDS; financial aid at colleges and universities; free hospital care for the indigent, and programs providing food, clothing or shelter for children or the aged.

University Co-Chairs East Coast Writing Fellows Conference

Writing Fellows from La Salle University and the University of Pennsylvania chaired the East Coast Peer Tutoring Conference on Nov. 3-4, at Parsippany, N.J.

According to Dr. Margot Soven, coordinator of La Salle's Writing Fellows Program, the East Coast Peer Tutoring Conference provides a unique opportunity for students to discuss theories and strategies related to peer tutoring. The purpose of the conference is to facilitate an exchange between schools which have Writing Fellows programs, programs in which peer tutors are assigned to classes in all disciplines to help students with their papers. Writing Fellows read and respond to the drafts of the essays and reports written in those classes. In some cases they also staff the Writing Center.

The Conference was attended by 100 students from Swarthmore College, Williams College, Brown University, The University of Pennsylvania, and La Salle University. Each school assumes responsibility for a segment of the conference program. With the aid of their instructors, students plan and conduct the conference workshops.

The program this year addressed such topics as the image of the peer tutor, gender and ethnicity issues as they affect peer tutoring, "creative conferencing," the role of the peer tutor when discussing content, the relationship between the faculty and the peer tutor, the writing center as context, how to publicize peer tutoring programs, the role of written versus oral comments in responding to student papers, writing in different disciplines, and the nature of academic rhetoric and style. The University of Pennsylvania demonstrated a workshop on writing college papers which they offer during freshman orientation week at Penn.

La Salle sent eight students to the conference. Each of them led a small group workshop session with approximately ten to twelve participants. Materials were prepared in advance. They participated actively throughout the conference.

The Conference gives La Salle students a chance to learn from both the students and instructors who represent the other schools involved. Furthermore, all of La Salle's participants had the experience of serving in a leadership role in a multi-school setting. In addition students have commented that the conference helps to strengthen the relationships between the La Salle tutors.

"In broader terms, I believe the East Coast Peer Tutoring Conference gives students a chance to gain a better understanding of what it means to be an academic," explained Dr. Soven. "By observing the interaction of their professors, as well as by participating with their professors and fellow students as colleagues in a serious dialogue about primary issues in the academy—literacy, pedagogy, issues of ethnicity and gender, and student-faculty relationships, students experience the exhilaration that many of us associate with meaningful scholarly exchange."

Kemper Foundation Awards Scholarship

La Salle University freshman Jennifer Lilly Schenk, of Virginia Beach, VA, has been selected to participate in the Kemper Scholars Program, supported by the James S. Kemper Foundation. La Salle University is one of only fifteen schools nationwide to participate in the program.

A permanent memorial to honor the university's recipients of the Christian R. and Mary F. Lindback Distinguished Teaching Award has been installed in the foyer of the Connelly Library. Some 65 La Salle professors have been honored including Dr. Joseph F. Flubacher, '35 (center), emeritus professor of economics, and the 1990 awardees, Dr. Stephen F. and economics major at La Salle, where she has participated in various intramural sports activities. Following graduation in 1994, she plans to attend law school.

The purpose of the Kemper Scholars Program is to help highly motivated students combine their university studies with carefully selected summer jobs to enhance their personal and professional development in preparation for a career in business.

Kemper Scholars must maintain a grade point average of 2.8. It is not mandatory that recipients major in business, but they must be committed to work in a business related field. Once chosen, the Kemper Scholars must commit themselves to three summers of employment at any Kemper Office across the United States.

In addition to the summer employment, Kemper Scholars may be granted financial aid to meet any unsatisfied financial need. They also have access to the academic and career planning resources of the Foundation.

Forensic Workshop Held for Students

La Salle University's second annual "Forensic Workshop" was held recently on campus.

Dr. Norbert Belzer, chairman of the biology department, said that approximately 40 students from St. John Neumann participated in the project, which was presented to the students as a murder-mystery scenario where they had to "solve a crime" through the various procedures taught to them, and by

"clues" such as mugshots, videotapes and handouts.

With the assistance of La Salle University chemistry, biology and geology/physics faculty, the students were taught fingerprinting, ABO bloodtyping, and chromatography. The students also were taught how to perform other chemical analysis, such as identifying poisons and soil samples.

Dr. Belzer says the project attempts to get high school students interested in the science field, as well as in attending college.

William Quinn, F.S.C., Ph.D., La Salle's former academic vice president and dean, shows part of his stamp collection depicting "Birds of the World," that was recently on display in the Union Building. Brother William's collection totals about 28,000 and includes "all but about 80 or 100" of every stamp ever issued prior to 1970 depicting some species of a bird.

La Salle Mourns Deaths of First Admissions Director,

F. Christopher, F.S.C.

Brother F. Christopher, F.S.C., Ph.D., the first director of admissions and a former dean at La Salle University died on March 30 at Germantown Hospital after suffering a heart attack. He was 82.

A member of the Brothers of the Christian Schools for 61 years, Brother Christopher served as La Salle's director of admissions from 1955 until 1972 when he stepped down from full-time duties and worked as the university's coordinator of transfer admissions until his retirement in 1983.

Brother Christopher, who joined the La Salle faculty as an associate professor of biology in 1943, was appointed dean of the college in 1951. One of his many responsibilities then was administering all admissions responsibilities, a position that he assumed full-time four years later.

During Brother Christopher's career at La Salle, he watched the college grow from a small struggling institution of some 90 students who attended classes in two buildings during the closing days of World War II to a dynamic institution of almost 7,000 men and women attending day and evening classes at three separate campus locations.

"Not only was Christopher the revered 'dean' of admissions directors in the region, he had a profound influence on generations of students and high school guidance counselors," recalled La Salle's Brother President Patrick Ellis, F.S.C., Ph.D. "Often forgotten because of his prominence in admissions work was the fact that he was an excellent biology teacher. Legions of area physicians attribute their careers to his inspiration as an advisor to pre-medical students."

Brother Christopher, who also taught for two years at the University of Scranton and one year at La Salle College High School, was chairman of La Salle's Committee on Recommendation to Medical and Dental Colleges from 1947 to 1974.

Brother Christopher, who loved horticulture, took great pride in helping to landscape La Salle's campus. During the 1940s, he personally planted pin oak trees along 20th St. and Olney Ave. bordering La Salle's campus. In addition to teaching biology, he also moderated the university's undergraduate theatrical group, The Masque, for a while, edited the day school catalogue, and served on such campus committees as College Council, Athletics, and Public Relations.

A native of Baltimore, Brother Christopher worked as a salesman in one of his father's men's shops and attended Law School at the University of Maryland for a year before entering the Christian Brothers in 1929. One of his most cherished honors came 50 years later when Baltimore Mayor William Donald Schaefer proclaimed a "Day" for him in commemoration of his golden anniversary as a Brother. He was designated an "Admiral of Baltimore Harbor" at the same time.

Brother Christopher earned his bachelor's, master's, and doctorate degrees from The Catholic University of America, in Washington, D.C.

A member of numerous scientific, academic, and professional societies, Brother Christopher was former president of the National Association of College Admissions Counselors, an emeritus member of the Pennsylvania Association of College Admissions Counselors, and a co-founder of the Catholic College Coordinating Council.

He was also a member of the American Association of Collegiate Registrars and Admissions Officers, A.E.D. International Pre-Medical Honor Society, K.M.E. National Mathematics Honor Society, and Pi Delta Phi National French Honor Society, among others.

He is survived by a sister, Mrs. Agnes M. Schirf, of Baltimore.

A Mass of Christian Burial was celebrated on April 3 at the La Salle University Chapel on campus. Burial was on the following day at the Christian Brothers Cemetery, in Ammandale, Md.

Richard Lautz

Dr. Richard Lautz, associate professor of English at La Salle, died on January 22 after a long illness. Richard was 55.

A native of Buffalo, New York, Richard came to La Salle in 1968, after receiving his M.A. from the University of Arkansas and his Ph.D. (specializing in Victorian literature) from the University of Pennsylvania. He had taught previously at Brockport State College in New York. Richard quickly established himself as one of the most talented teachers at La Salle, and he was honored by the university with its Lindback Award for Distinguished Teaching. According to John Keenan, former chair of the English Department, "Richard Lautz had the reputation of being one of the most enthusiastic, provocative, and knowledgeable teachers in this department of 45 teachers."

For two decades Richard was advisor to the undergraduate literary magazine, Grimoire. For almost as long, he served as poetry editor of Four Quarters, one of the nation's oldest small press magazines. A fixture at poetry readings in Philadelphia and New York, Richard maintained correspondence and friendship with many contemporary poets. Last year Richard donated to La Salle his several hundred volume collection of contemporary American poetry—nearly all first editions and many inscribed to Richard—to form the Lautz Special Collection.

Richard's dedicated following of students was especially evident in La Salle's Honors Program, where he taught a course in the Freshman Interdisciplinary Program and an immensely popular upper-level seminar in The City in Literature. Throughout his career at La Salle, Richard gloried in roducing students to the cultural treasures of the city of Philadelphia. Besides his general interests in art, in Victorian Literature, and in Contemporary Poetry, Richard was particularly interested in the Beat Poets; a highlight of his special topics course in this subject was the appearance in the course of poet Allen Ginsberg. During the last two decades, Richard brought many, many writers of note to La Salle.

When Richard was asked to revise his biographical statement in La Salle's Guide for English Majors, he—characteristically—decided to use the space to write about his former students: "One of the few pleasures of middle age," he began his statement, "is discovering that so many of your former students have become such accomplished and, frequently, published writers." Richard did not say why so many of his students became successful, but anyone who knew Richard and his superlative teaching knew the reason.

Contributions in Richard's memory may be made to the English Department at La Salle University (Philadelphia, PA 19141), which has set up a fund in his honor.

James J. Henry

James J. Henry, the long-time athletic director at La Salle University, the Explorers first varsity basketball coach, and one of the founders of Philadelphia's Big Five, died on Dec. 19 after suffering a heart attack at Burdette Tomlin Hospital, in Cape May Court House, N.J. He was 84 and had lived in nearby Avalon since retiring from La Salle in 1969.

Henry, who also taught finance at La Salle, helped to develop the Explorers' athletic program into one of national prominence during his 35 year tenure as athletic director.

In addition to seeing La Salle become one of the few schools in the nation to win both major basketball championships—the National Invitational Tournament (1952) and NCAA (1954), Henry founded the first Catholic College Crew program at La Salle and watched the oarsmen capture six Dad Vail national titles during one seven year stretch.

La Salle also achieved national prominence in swimming and track during Henry's term as athletic director with Joe Verdeur winning a gold medal with a record-smashing performance in the 200 meter butterfly in the 1948 Olympics in London and Ira Davis and Al Cantello representing the Explorers in the triple jump and javelin, respectively, in later Olympic games.

Henry was one of the founding athletic directors of the unique Big Five in 1955 which saw La Salle, St. Joseph's, Villanova, Temple, and Penn flourish as one of nation's most successful intracity major college basketball leagues for more than 35 years.

"Jim Henry was a rock of integrity," recalled Brother President Patrick Ellis, F.S.C., Ph.D., recently. "The man established a tradition here that is still maintained today."

Henry made All America honorable mention as an end at Villanova. After graduation, he joined La Salle's staff as an assistant football coach in 1930 and was named head football and basketball coach the following year, guiding the Explorers to a 15-4 record in their first official year on the intercollegiate hardwood. He was promoted to athletic director in 1934 and presided over the Explorers football program during its ten year existence as an intercollegiate sport at La Salle.

Football, indeed, was one of his major loves. In addition to serving as one of the nation's top football officials—working such classics as Army-Navy and the Sugar Bowl, Henry was chairman of the board of the prestigious Maxwell Football Club, in Philadelphia. In 1984, the club established the Jim Henry Award given annually to an outstanding area high school football player who also excels in the classroom and community.

The past president of the Eastern Intercollegiate Football Officials Association, he was also a long-time member of the executive committees of the former Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference (ECAC) and Middle Atlantic States Collegiate Athletic Conference. La Salle awarded him an honorary Doctor of Laws degree in 1955.

Henry is survived by his wife, Julia; a daughter, Julie Marie Berger, a son, Joseph, 17 grandchildren and seven great-grandchildren.

A Mass of Christian Burial was sung on Dec. 22 at Maris Stella Church, in Avalon. Burial was in Holy Sepulchre Cemetery.

Walter J. Kaiser

Walter J. Kaiser, '47, a member of La Salle's Accounting Department faculty for 42 years before his retirement in 1989, died on Jan. 24 in Abington Memorial Hospital.

Kaiser, an associate professor of accounting at La Salle, was also a certified public accountant and had his own firm in Philadelphia, and more recently, in Huntingdon Valley.

He was an Army veteran of World War II and attended North Texas State Teacher College in 1943-44 as an engineering major as part of the U.S. Army's Specialized Training Program.

A resident of Southampton, Pa., for many years before moving to nearby Horsham, Kaiser was an active member of the Lions Club.

He is survived by one daughter, Bernadette Kaiser-Bonal, four sons, Gerard, Joseph, Christopher, and Thomas, and four grandchildren.

A Mass of Christian Burial was sung on Jan. 26 at Our Lady of Good Counsel Church, in Southampton. Burial was in Holy Sepulchre Cemetery.

Donations in Mr. Kaiser's memory may be made either to the Livengrin Foundation, 4833 Hulmeville Road, Bensalem, PA 19020, or to the Dominican Retreat House, Ashbourne and Juniper Aves., Elkins Park, PA 19117.

—1990-91 Basketball Roundup—

It was a Season of Highs and Lows for the Men and Women

There were highs (133 points at Loyola Marymount on New Year's Eve) and lows (50 points against St. Peter's in the MAAC semifinals).

There were ups (a 102-94 victory at Villanova's duPont Pavilion) and downs (an 84-68 blowout at Notre Dame, among others).

But that's the way it was for the 1990-91 version of La Salle University's men's basketball, just one season removed from the giddy heights of a 30-2 Lionel Simmons-powered steamroller. The Explorers did retain a share of the Metro Atlantic Athletic Conference, finishing in a tie with Siena when both teams wound up with 12-4 regular-season records. A 19-9 overall record received one more mark on the loss side, a 93-90 National Invitation Tournament loss at the University of Massachusetts.

Meanwhile, on the women's side, one of the season highs came in the same game as one of its lows. On January 6, La Salle's senior Academic All-American, Mary Greybush, scored 36 points against the University of Michigan at the Wolverines' Crisler Arena, one of the greatest performances at that storied court which has housed many greats.

But it ended in a heartbreaking 67-65 loss, a game of mixed emotions that typified the season. A 10-7 MAAC campaign was followed by a first-round loss in the conference tournament that brought the year to a close with a 16-12 mark.

Despite the disappointments, many of which were brought on by illness and injuries to key players, coach John Miller saw some bright spots.

"This team did not win 20 games nor participate in the NCAA Tournament as our fans have become accustomed to," Miller said, "but those close to the team realize how hard-fought and satisfying that 16-12 record was."

Although the ending was almost similar for the men of coach Speedy Morris, it didn't head down that road until late in the season. The Explorers, led by senior captain Doug Overton and juniors Randy Woods and Jack Hurd, vaulted to a 16-4 record. Then two ominous events cropped up.

La Salle's Academic All America Mary Greybush hugs her mother, Theresa, after scoring her 1,000th career point against Temple at Hayman Hall on Dec. 11. Greybush, who has a 3.32 GPA as a Biology/English major, finished sixth on La Salle's all-time scoring list with 1,404 points.

In a struggle of strong defenses, La Salle led St. Peter's, 57-55.

With only eight seconds remaining, the Peacocks' Jasper Walker hit a three-pointer, and La Salle had lost a key battle on its Philadelphia Civic Center home court.

In practice the next day, Overton suffered a sprained left ankle that would sideline him for the Big 5 showdown against St. Joseph's and three more games, and obviously hamper his efforts when he did return.

Overton, a superior guard with All-America and NBA credentials, tried to return against St. Peter's at Jersey City, played a half and obviously was not ready. In the MAAC Tournament opener in Albany against Loyola (Md.), Overton began to show some semblance of his old self, and even more in another loss to St. Peter's, this one in the MAAC semifinals.

That setback removed the Explorers from the NCAA Tournament picture and ended that three-year streak. A bid to the National Invitation Tournament came fourth and the reward was that trip to UMass. With the score 93-90 against the Explorers, and time running out, the ball got to Overton, who took a long shot, aiming for the tying three-pointer. It hit the rim, bounced away, and with it, took the last vestige of hope for Overton and his mates.

Overton had come back, indeed. He played the entire 40 minutes, had 19 points, 10 assists, six rebounds and not a turnover. It wasn't enough. When he missed that final fling, he and fellow guard Woods met and embraced near midcourt, realizing it was the curtain-dropper for this great backcourt duo.

Maybe, along about now, it will have hit Doug Overton, future NBA guard, that his La Salle playing days are over. And when commencement time came, he was there to receive his degree in Elementary/Special Education.

"I might be in my room or home with my mom," he said, "when I will realize that this La Salle experience is over and what it has done for me. I might even miss hurrying to those 3:30 practices because then I'll realize I won't be putting on the Blue and Gold anymore."

The Explorer Network—An Opportunity To Enrich The La Salle Community By Sharing Your Career Experiences.

by Lou Lamorte & Gen Carlton

When asked by interviewers why they chose to come to La Salle, students frequently cite the strong sense of community that exists here, a bond they believe extends not only to faculty and administrators but incorporates La Salle alumni as well. It may be due to this sense of community that many of the students who utilize Career Planning's services not only participate in on-campus recruiting and explore the various options we have for locating full-time employment, they also request alumni contacts and ask about opportunities to meet with La Salle graduates employed in their area of interest. La Salle students sometimes cite programs that they have heard about from other schools, especially Ivy League Schools, where there is a long tradition of "networking" between students and alumni.

In addition to the undergraduates, there has been a tremendous increase in the number of alumni who are using our services. They too frequently request the names and addresses of La Salle graduates so that they can seek information and advice. In addition, they express interest in companies who have hired a number of La Salle graduates and want to be informed when fellow alumni are giving on-campus presentations.

Because our students and recent graduates have expressed such a high degree of interest in making contact with La Salle Alums, Career Planning is creating a formalized Alumni Career Development Network—"The Explorer Network". The Network will give you the opportunity to offer much needed advice and assistance to students and young alumni.

The Explorer Network is an expansion of the existing World of Work program which has been active for over a decade. This program matches students and young alumni with established La Salle alumni employed in a career area of interest to the graduate or student. Recent graduates report that the program was one of the most beneficial aspects of their career decision making process. Christina Mazza, a senior English major and Dean's List student since Freshman year, found that the program was an excellent way to help define a focus for her job search. She commented "I came away from this placement feeling confident that there are opportunities for me in insurance and that they appeal to me. The information I got was much more valuable than anything I would have obtained from books."

As Christina's comment illustrates, you can make a very valuable contribution to the La Salle community by participating in the Explorer Network. By joining, you can assist our students, enhance their educational experience and enrich their lives and careers. There are many ways to participate:

- Discuss your career/job with students, individually at your work site or in groups on campus;
- Represent your company at job and/or career fairs held at La Salle;
- Refer job leads for permanent, co-op, summer, and part-time openings within your organization;
- Promote La Salle students and programs within your geographic region;
- Sponsor La Salle graduates for employment opportunities offered by your company
- Participate in our renowned On-Campus Recruitment Program for graduating seniors and MBA candidates;
- List available job openings through the CPPB's job posting system including the Telephone JobLine.

Please assist us in helping La Salle students and young alumni as many other graduates have done. Complete the information in the box below and return it to the Career Planning and Placement Bureau, La Salle University, 20th and Olney Avenue, 4th Floor Administration Center, Philadelphia, PA 19141. We will be contacting you with further details. If you have any questions on this program do not hesitate to call Lou Lamorte at (215) 951-1075.

The Marquee de Sade of The Ten O'Clock News

It wasn't enough for the author to be an award-winning playwright and popular university teacher. No, he had to get on TV and become a movie critic.

By Bill Wine

Bill Wine (left) chats with other members of Channel 29's "The Ten O'Clock News" team: anchors Jill Chernekoff and Lee McCarthy, and weathercaster Rich Manieri (right). He was recently nominated for a regional Emmy award.

I'm having lunch in a Philadelphia diner with my wife and daughters. A teenaged girl approaches our booth, biting into a piece of toast as she walks. "My parents sent me over," she says sheepishly when she arrives. She glances back over her shoulder in the direction of her parents' booth, where a man and woman are simultaneously grinning like game show contestants, waving at me, and urging her on. "We watch your movie reviews on TV," says the messenger, finally. Then she leans closer and adopts a conspiratorial whisper. "We especially like it when you trash them."

There are lots of vivid contrasts between teaching in a university and appearing regularly on television. Here's one:

No one, in my decade of teaching at La Salle, has ever approached me anywhere and said, "We especially like it when you fail them."

I'd remember.

Trust me.

In the early part of 1990—by proclamation of a mirthful God who apparently felt that the requisite grading of film and writing students at the end of every semester had not already filled me with enough self-loathing for one lifetime—I was hired by WTXF-TV in Philadelphia as their movie critic.

Why shouldn't it be someone with style, wit, energy, expertise, humility— and a tolerance for bad movies?

So now actors, directors, screenwriters, and assorted craftspeople and technicians can do labor-intensive artwork for eighteen months, and when it is all over, I can show snippets of their handiwork on “The Ten O’Clock News” on Channel 29 and deliver the equivalent of a three-minute Ach-pooey.

Nice job: I hear the Marquis de Sade’s press agent is looking for clients.

Dear Phoney,

How does it feel to you and the other two a—holes, Siskel and Ebert, to be singled out by the good Lord to be able to be the only people on this planet who are intelligent enough to be able to tell moviegoers if a movie is worth seeing? We dummies sure do appreciate your insight.

Phoney, huh? Well, I’ve been called a lot worse. I’ve gotten hate mail that makes my most sarcastic pans look like hosannas to a deity.

Apparently, many newspaper readers and television viewers take criticism of a work a lot more personally than do the artists who are being skewered.

But there is nothing quite like the immediacy and impact of broadcast television. In my first month on the air at Channel 29, I got more direct feedback—phone calls, murmured asides from opportunistic drivers of adjacent cars, letters, comments from store clerks about how much shorter I looked in person, post cards, and even, God help us, requests for autographs—than in fifteen years of writing reviews for newspapers and magazines.

Of course, offended viewers seeking revenge against pun-and-run critics are merely the video-age sound-bite equivalents of earlier critics of critics. These unpaid pundits may think that their late-night phone calls and devastating through-the-car-window putdowns are a new kind of purge-and-gulp warfare, but they are actually at the end of a long line of skilled epigrammatists.

Like Francis Bacon: “Critics are like brushers of noblemen’s clothes.”

And Benjamin Disraeli: “You know who the critics are? The men who failed at literature and art.”

Kenneth Tynan: “A critic is a man who knows the way but can’t drive the car.”

Brenda Behan: “Critics are like eunuchs in a harem.”

Or Mel Brooks: “Critics can’t even make music by rubbing their back legs together.”

Okay. So I’m a legless man teaching running. A biter of other people’s backs. A dog paid to choose among lampposts. A bunch of biases held loosely together by a sense of taste.

White flag. I surrender to popular opinion.

And what is my rejoinder, the rationale that allows me to function amidst all this admittedly apropos flak?

Simple: Somebody’s got to do it. So why shouldn’t it be someone with style, wit, energy, expertise—humility: let’s not forget humility—and a tolerance for bad movies that would make your Uncle Ralph’s tie collection look tasteful?

Dear News Director,

I would like to bring something to your attention. The movie critic you have on your news program is either on drugs or has been out in the sun too long. It’s pretty obvious that he is emotionally unbalanced and is doing a great disservice to the people of Philadelphia.

In truth, by the time I became part of the one-eyed monster medium, years of writing reviews for the print media had pretty much measured me for the evaluator’s cloak that I would now so pompously drape over my street clothes. What it hadn’t prepared me for, however, was the precious brevity of television air time.

I used to think it was tough saying everything I had to say about a film in fifteen column inches in a newspaper. In retrospect, twas a piece o’ cake. Compared to the detailed, rambling mode of a standard print review, analyzing a feature film in two minutes of air time is akin to downing a seven-course dinner while driving through the Minit Car Wash.

Nor did my time in the print trenches prime me for the flipflopping of priorities necessary to accommodate what often seems like the first commandment of television news: Appearance isn’t the most important thing—it’s the only thing.

With decades of jobs for which I could dress pretty much any way I wanted under my unfashionable belt—freelance writing, newspapers, magazines, radio, even teaching—I suddenly found myself strapped down between a brand new set of stereo speakers. On the left: TV’s preoccupation with cosmetics. On the right: the scrutiny of the closeup lens.

And the song constantly blasting from those speakers? Why, that old standard, the

Get-A-Haircut-Use-More-Powder-Straighten-Your-Collar-Fix-Your-Tie-Come-To-Think-Of-It-Change-Your-Tie-In-Fact-Enhance-Your-Whole-Wardrobe-Blues.

The key? See sharp.

Thanksgiving dinner. I’m passing the potatoes to my sister-in-law. “We saw you on TV the other night,” she says, as she drops a heaping helping on her son’s plate. “Which night?” I ask. “I’m not sure,” says she, passing the bowl back to me. “What movie?” I ask, taking some potatoes for myself. "Can't remember," she says, "but you were wearing that stupid green tie, the one with the wide stripes. And a striped shirt, no less."

So what does a television movie critic do exactly? Well, as I see it, the critic has three functions. He is, first and foremost, a passionate moviegoer (and not, unless he and his audience are asking for trouble, a frustrated filmmaker) who grooves on escaping reality so much, he is willing to spend an inordinate amount of time in dark rooms watching every conceivable kind of movie. On the hierarchy of "skills," this ranks somewhere near the ability to whistle while eating spaghetti.

After seeing these movies before they open—thus providing him with the thrill of a "scoop," but one that registers a mere 2.5 on the journalistic Richter scale—he shares his perceptions with his audience. If he's serious about his work, he tries to evaluate what the filmmaker is trying to achieve and how close the film comes to achieving it, and whether or not the finished product seems a worthwhile art or entertainment option (translation: $) for viewers.

But he is cognizant of the fact, that, regardless of the film he is reviewing, most of his viewers will not end up seeing it in a theater at any time in a future near enough to allow the residue of his words to have any impact. Which is why the review he delivers must be inherently interesting or entertaining beyond the level of a consumer report.

Lastly, he is, whether he wants to admit it or not, one of the spokes in the movie publicity wheel, letting the public know what's out there—or is it in there? This may seem ironic, given that critics pan something like half the films they review. But in the love-me-or-hate-me-but-don't-ignore-me mentality of contemporary advertising, it's free air time nonetheless.

Dear Mr. Wine,

What's happened to you? Last night you reviewed an awful movie as if it was the second coming of Citizen Kane. I haven't seen the film, nor will I, but I can tell it's a terrible movie. There was a time when you reviewed movies. Now you merely promote them. Who's paying you off?

Far be it from me to bust the balloon of conspiracy theorists, but not only have I never—in all my years of writing movie reviews—gotten a single bribe or request related to the dispensing of my honest opinion about a movie, I've never even heard an anecdote about any colleague getting one. It would appear that the movie reviewing business is shockingly, boringly, sensationally uncorrupted.

At least on the surface. While there may be little or no political or institutional pressure to perform sects-change operations on one's opinions, there are other self-censorship agents working undercover, doing the dirty deed in the collective subconscious.

There is, for openers, the desire to be quoted, a thirst so unquenchable for certain critics, it has them dispensing superlatives like Pan Am stewardesses serving complimentary soft drinks on a 36-hour flight.

“The invitation to be wickedly witty is similarly intoxicating.”

The invitation to be wickedly witty is similarly intoxicating. The ain't-I-cute attention a critic gets shoveling sarcastic sallies onto the coffin of a stillborn movie as it's lowered into the grave is a difficult fringe benefit for any card-carrying egotist to turn down.

A lifelong respect for a filmmaker's work can easily color a critic's response to a particular movie—as can antipathy toward an artist. In the same way, fondness for or attraction to a performer—to say nothing of unbridled, career-long contempt—undoubtedly muddies the critical waters.

Then there is the frustrating When-was-the-last-time-I-saw-something-I-liked? dry spell, which can bestow on mediocre movies the mantle of masterpiece. Or the I-must-be-getting-soft string of raves, which can rain on the parade of a respectable but not spectacular film that the critic happens to catch when his tank of vitriol needs emptying.

In truth, most of these vacuum-abhorring viruses come with the proverbial territory, and members of the critical community fall victim to them occasionally.

Some more than others.

Dear News Staff,

It's about time someone said something about the alleged movie critic Bill Wine. Why is this man so negative about every movie he sees? Is there a movie he doesn't put down? I suggest someone contact Leonard Nimoy and have him do a special entitled "In Search of a Movie Bill Wine Actually Likes."

Television movie reviews are to movie reviews as television news is to news. That is, they are a little more than a headline service and a lot less than an education. As the lowest-common-denominator medium, television is the massest of the media, a compelling, voracious, ubiquitous friend that renders our nation a video-cracy. So, like everything else shaped to fit the confines of the tube, movie reviews must offer exciting visuals, tip-of-the-iceberg information, and some emotional content—in other words, film clips, bare-bones plot synopsis, and strong opinion.

When an ex-print critic first takes on this task, he feels he is being asked to make the kinds of compromises that give lab rats hernias. Visions of tennis players without rackets, sculptors wearing mittens, and politicians with scruples dance into view. They want me to write down to the television audience, the critic tells himself, when yet another reference is edited out as being too esoteric. Do they go to restaurants hoping to find a chef who cooks no better than they do? he asks himself. Of course not. So why must I write and talk just as they do?

Sounds good when you debate yourself. But that's not the way the game is played. So you get used to it.

Dear News Director,

How do people of Bill Wine's shallowness and stupidity end up in the mass media? I understand that he also teaches film at a university, which explains why Hollywood produces what it does. It's a total travesty of the art and discussion process that a man like him is handed an audience. It's really a joke, a very sad joke.

As a desperate attempt to create some semblance of closure, I offer the Ten Commandments for Movie Critics on TV:

I.) There are no commandments for movie critics on TV.

II.) There are so. Boy, it sure is easy being glib when you dwell on the negative.

III.) Things could be worse. You could be plying an honest trade.

IV.) Things could be downright rotten. You could be paying for all these movies you see.

V.) Critics' screenings—with half-a-dozen silent scribes in the theater—sure beats a large audience, half of whom invariably ignore the film and chat. The rest discuss the plot. Loudly.

VI.) Good films are a lot more enjoyable to watch than mediocre films.

VII.) Mediocre films are more enjoyable to watch than bad films.

VIII.) But good films and bad films are easier to write about than mediocre ones, and bad films are the easiest to write entertainingly and memorably about—which is why people remember them.

IX.) You don't have to be a chef to know if the soup is tasty.

X.) Quote Commandment IX whenever anyone begins a question with the phrase, "What gives you the right . . .?" and scoffs when you include in your answer the phrase, "one person's opinion."

Dear Bill,

Thanks for the reviews, guy. I disagree with you much of the time, but it's still stimulating to hear why you think what you do.

I made that one up.

Nobody said self-pity was a pretty sight.

Bill Wine is an associate professor of communication at La Salle. He has won a number of playwriting competitions including the Dalton Little Theatre New Play Project, Virginia Beach One-Act Playwriting Festival, and the Ruby Lloyd Apsey Playwriting competition. His most recent production, "Parenthesis," was featured at the Off-Loop Theatre Festival and was acclaimed by the Chicago Tribune.

STUDENTS EXTRAORDINAIRE

It is no secret that academically, La Salle students have distinguished themselves—not only by winning more than their share of just about every graduate award and fellowship offered, but by later excelling in the nation's best graduate, law, and medical schools. Many of these brilliant men and women, through their own ingenuity, creativity, and perseverance, have also enjoyed exhilarating experiences during their undergraduate days. Jennifer Hasson, '92, who worked as a student intern in the university's News Bureau this spring, visited the remarkable young people pictured on this page and wrote the following profiles.

DAVID WIGMORE and ARICA YOUNG

Two La Salle students, David Wigmore and Arica Young, are recipients of Fulbright Grants for the 1990-91 school year.

A total of 46 La Salle students have now won these fellowships which were started after World War II by Senator J. William Fulbright in order to improve relations with foreign countries.

For David Wigmore, '91, a German major from Bridgewater, N.J., the Fulbright is a dream come true. Even before he decided to come to La Salle, Wigmore was considering the possibility of aiming for this prestigious award. "Before I actually applied to La Salle, I remember seeing in a newsletter that La Salle ranks just behind some Ivy League schools in the number of Fulbrights," Wigmore recalled.

Under the guidance of his sponsor, Dr. Leo Rudnytzky, Wigmore chose Austrian author George Saiko as his topic for the scholarship. He concentrated on how the period during which Saiko wrote, from World War I to World War II, influenced the Austria of today.

As part of the grant, Wigmore will study at the University of Vienna and teach English conversation to high school students. In order to prepare for his position as an instructor, he will take education courses this summer.

Wigmore, who has studied German for nine years, was a member of the German club at La Salle and of the First Aid Squad in his hometown.

During the 1989-90 school year, Wigmore was a participant in the La Salle-in-Europe Program and took classes at the University of Fribourg in Switzerland. While there he had the rare opportunity to spend New Year's Eve literally on top of the Berlin Wall.

"I'm never going to forget it," says Wigmore who is donating a piece of the wall to La Salle. "As far as you could see, there were hundreds of people just banging away."

Wigmore thought this gift would be the best way to say "thank you" to La Salle for providing him with this incredible opportunity.

After he returns from the University of Vienna, Wigmore plans to pursue graduate studies.

Arica Young, '91, who also majored in German, is a Philadelphia resident and was a member of the German and

The Fulbright Tradition Continues

Ukrainian clubs at La Salle. A graduate of Little Flower High School, Young has studied German for eight years.

For her project, she chose to focus on Uriel Birnbaum, a commercial artist and author whose father developed the term "Zionism." Birnbaum, an Austrian Jew, wrote essays about the restoration of the Habsburg Empire after World War I. Young was introduced to the topic by Dr. Bernhardt Blumenthal, her sponsor.

Like Wigmore, Young will also study at the University of Vienna and teach a high school English class for 12 hours a week while she is in Austria.

Europe is not entirely new territory to Young, who participated in the La Salle-in-Europe program during the 1989-90 school year. In addition to her classes at the University of Fribourg in Switzerland, Young travelled to countries such as Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Bulgaria and what was then East Germany.

She was also fortunate enough to be in eastern Europe during the outbreak of political change. Young said that the experience was "very interesting—especially the transition [from Communism]. You could see where it was causing border problems."

Because of the mass confusion and tight security in these countries, Young had difficulty crossing borders. At one point she was taken off a train and asked to turn over her passport. "I was terrified," explained Young, "because they were barking at me. I was bewildered."

Despite the problems she encountered while in Europe, Young said that she is looking forward to "the intercultural experience" of living and studying in Austria.

After Young completes her studies in Austria, she plans to pursue her master's degree in International Studies. Later, she would like to earn her doctorate and teach.

Both Wigmore and Young strongly encourage their fellow students to participate in the La Salle-in-Europe Program. As Wigmore remarked, "you really find out what it is to be an American."

Wigmore and Young were selected out of an estimated 55 applicants who applied for the 18 available Austrian Fulbright Grants.

PATRICE McCaULEY/A Cooperative Gain Theory for the Mathematics Association

Patrice McCauley, '91, a mathematics major and native of Longport, N.J., was granted the rare opportunity of not only performing undergraduate research but also presenting her findings at the National Meeting of Mathematics Association last January in San Francisco.

Her paper, titled "Axioms and Values on Partition Function Form Gains," was the result of McCauley's eight weeks of research on Cooperative Gain Theory at Drew University in Madison, N.J. Cooperative Gain Theory describes the process through which people make a profit and distribute the capital among themselves.

"There are different ways of describing a gain, characteristic function form and partition function form. Ninety-five percent of the work has been done on characteristic function form. I worked on extending some of the results from the characteristic function form to the partition function form," McCauley explained.

Although the topic was suggested by the Research Experience for Undergraduates program, McCauley conducted her research independently in Drew University's library and met periodically with the coordinator of the program. While at Drew U., she also received free housing and a $2,000 stipend.

McCauley was selected for the research program based on her mathematical abilities, enthusiasm for math and the benefits it would provide for her future career plans.

McCauley and 24 other students from various colleges and universities presented their papers at the National Meeting to members of the Mathematics Association over a period of four days. The undergraduates were chosen to present their papers because they were able to complete their research with successful results.

When asked how her friends responded to her experience, McCauley said they were "very supportive." She remarked that her friends were not intimidated by her endeavor but were excited for her.

"I learned that research is a lot different from learning," McCauley recalls from her experience, "it's a lot of trial and error—with learning, everything is already set out for you." She also added that her favorite part of the program was when professors and other researchers asked her about the results she found.

After graduation, McCauley plans to perform graduate research and inspire young minds to follow in her footsteps through mathematical instruction on a college level.

JOHN TOCZYDLOWSKI/A Finnegan Fellowship for the Farmer

John Toczydlowski, a junior from northeast Philadelphia, spent the Fall 1990 semester studying America's second favorite pastime—food. He participated in an honors semester titled "Who Goes Hungry: Formulating a Food Policy For The Year 2000" that was provided by the National Collegiate Honors Council.

Toczydlowski and nine students from other universities attended Iowa State University for one semester and spent a weekend on a working farm. While at Iowa State, Toczydlowski, a political science major with a minor in history, took classes in ethics, political economy, international trade and even farm technology. He also conducted independent research on the Conservation Reserve Program, a program set up by the government to control farming activities. "The government pays farmers to keep land out of production," Toczydlowski explained.

Despite the large number of students who attend Iowa State (24,000), Toczydlowski's classes were confined to the ten students who were participating in the honors semester. Surprisingly enough, he remarked that "everything is a couple steps slower—it's not as hectic on campus as it is at La Salle."

As part of the program, Toczydlowski had the opportunity to spend a weekend on the farm of the president of Iowa's Corn Growers Association located in northeast Iowa. Because the weekend fell during harvest time, he said that he "got to see everything in action."

Even though he had never been on a working farm before, Toczydlowski was required to fulfill certain duties such as feeding the pigs and cows. "It was quite an experience. I had to run my sneakers through the wash about eight times to get them clean," he recalled.

Toczydlowski is also the 1990 recipient of the James A. Finnegan Public Service Fellowship. The fellowship is awarded to students interested in pursuing a career in public service. As part of the fellowship program, Toczydlowski served as an intern in State Representative Dennis M. O'Brien's Philadelphia office.

The James A. Finnegan Public Service Fellowship Program is named after Pennsylvania's former Secretary of the Commonwealth and past president of Philadelphia's City Council.

The program provides for at least one fellowship per year to one or more La Salle students interested in pursuing a career in public service. In addition, the student awardees are placed in internship positions in local, state and federal government offices.

After graduation in 1992, Toczydlowski plans to pursue a career in either politics or museum studies.

KRISTINE DEMARK/Classes on a Double Masted Schooner

Water, water, everywhere, nor any drop to drink."

Kristine Demark, a senior biology and education major from Plymouth Meeting, PA, learned the true meaning of this famous Coleridge quote from "The Rime of the Ancient Mariner" after she spent the Spring 1990 semester at sea. The program, sponsored by Boston University, included six weeks of academic preparation on land and six weeks at sea aboard the SSV Corwith Cramer, a 135 foot double masted modified fishing schooner.

"We didn't hear a news report for six weeks. We were really detached from society," Demark explained.

She was accepted into the program and left for the campus of Sea Education in Woods Hole, Mass. on February 17, 1990. For six weeks Demark took courses in oceanography, maritime studies (the history and literature of the sea), and nautical science.

On April 6, 1990, Demark boarded the ship in Miami for her six weeks at sea. In addition to the ten member crew, 23 students from universities as far as Chicago and California sailed the vessel through the waters of the Atlantic and the Caribbean.

Demark's main task on the ship was to conduct an independent scientific research project on tar balls that form as a result of the coagulation of oil and sea water. Twice a day (at 12:00 A.M. and P.M.) Demark would pull in a net from the ocean and check its contents for tar balls. Her main objective was to discover which areas of the ocean contain the largest concentration of tar balls.

Demark spent her mornings sailing the large vessel and working in the science lab. In the afternoon, she attended a nautical science class and either worked on her research or studied the equipment in the engineering room. Instead of spending her evenings relaxing, Demark was required to help other students with their projects and, again, either sail or work on her research in the lab. All but eight hours of her free time was spent working on the ship.

Although the SSV Corwith Cramer docked in both the Dominican Republic and Bermuda, Demark was unable to relax on the beautiful beaches and soak up the sun. She had to help the crew restock the ship with food and water and also conduct more research on land.

Demark recalls that the most frightening moment on the ship occurred when they encountered a violent storm in which the vessel was tossed and turned by 12 foot waves. Despite this experience, Demark "enjoyed being away from the troubles of everyday life" and said that "all our problems revolved around the research—we didn't have to worry about anything else."

Demark is also one of six members of La Salle's diving team. She recently qualified for the Eastern Seaboard Championships. Chris Bergere, Demark's coach, described her as a good diver and swimmer who works very hard on perfecting her dives. "Kristine has a strong mind and will to compete. She does very pretty dives and she is getting better and better every year."

In addition to earning 17 credits for her adventure, Demark has gained valuable experience that will benefit her should she choose to conduct research after graduation. However, according to Demark, the most profound skill she gained on her trip is a simple one that will last a lifetime—"I really learned how to appreciate nature."

JAMES and MARGARET GANTNER/Partners With an Incredible Vision

James and Margaret Gantner, School of Continuing Studies marketing majors, are partners both at home and in school. At home in Philadelphia, they are partners in marriage and share the tasks of raising their two sons, James and John, housekeeping and other duties.

They are also partners in school—they take classes and study together in order to maintain their Dean's List status.

However, James and Margaret are two unique individuals. James is a full time father, husband and student who lost his sight in 1982 to juvenile diabetes. Margaret is not only a full time mother, wife and student but also has a part time job at a law firm in Philadelphia.

When their eldest son was a junior in high school, James, a graduate of Father Judge High School, went with his son to various college preparatory meetings. As a result, James became increasingly more interested in pursuing a degree.

In 1988 James enrolled at La Salle as a full time student. His wife initially accompanied him to help him with his studies but was soon bitten by the "college bug" and also enrolled full time.

James describes his wife as a "hard worker" who doubles as "a built-in study partner." "I envy her," he says, "she dots all her i's and crosses all her t's."

Although most of his texts are on audio cassette, James is currently enrolled in a mathematics course in which Margaret has to read him the text because there is no cassette available. He explains that it is much harder to remember information that is heard than information that is read.

In the past James has tried to learn braille but felt that it was discouraging because it forced him to start reading on a first grade level.

In his leisure time, James golfs for the Middle Atlantic Blind Golf Association. The association plays twenty times a year at various golf clubs in the Delaware Valley. Each golfer has a coach, whom James describes as "our eyes," to position the golfers and caddy.

James also likes to take a three mile solo walk every day to increase his confidence and practice using a cane.

James is a firm believer in setting goals and pushing himself to attain those goals. When he first started at La Salle, he set for himself the goals of achieving at least a 3.0 grade point average and possibly even Dean's List status.

"I'm simply amazed at the perseverance of James and his wife. He does his work devotedly and without fanfare. He is an example to other students," says Brother Joseph Bender, his academic advisor.

As a result of his dedication and hard work, James surpassed his first goal and is currently on the Dean's List. Likewise, Margaret also took on the academic challenge of making the Dean's List and succeeded.

In addition to these goals, James and Margaret set for themselves a common goal—to walk up the aisle together when they receive their degrees. After graduation in 1992, they have tentative plans to attend law school together.

Regardless of what they decide to do, it is certain that James and Margaret have the motivation and mutual compatibility to succeed in the field of their choice.

Class of the Metro Atlantic (Again)

The Explorers literally blew their athletic opponents out of the water in '90-91

By Bob Vetrone

By Saturday night, Mark Valenti had his voice back.

By Sunday morning, his feet were on the ground. A few days later, the rest of him came down from Cloud Nine.

• • •

In a La Salle University athletic year crammed with excitement, excellence, disappointment, individual and team championships, several factors emerged.

The most important was what has become a La Salle rite of Spring—the winning of the Metro Atlantic Athletic Conference Commissioner's Cup, emblematic of dominance in the MAAC. And besides making it seven times in the Explorers' eight years of MAAC competition, it was all over by early March, the quickest clinching date in MAAC history.

But there were non-MAAC moments of joy and achievement, which brings us back to Mark Valenti and the La Salle crew.

He is La Salle's crew co-ordinator, a coach and director of the women's program. Pete Sigmund is also a crew coach and between the two, they had built the program to where it was winning at the big meets with crews in its class.

Then came May 11, and the Dad Vail Regatta on the Schuylkill. If you're a crew person, you weren't shocked by the turnout of 65,000 who lined the river banks that Saturday. Dad Vail has become a special weekend—a Philadelphia weekend, a Philadelphia partying weekend, if you please.

This year, it was a big party for La Salle.

For the first time since 1958, La

Salle won a heavyweight race in the Dad Vail. The heavyweight four with coxswain beat out 46 other boats through three heated races and swept past the finish line first in the championship race in 7:21.35, and the Explorer crew program had made it back in big-league style.

Then came the media to interrogate Sigmund and Valenti and, alas, Valenti was hoarse and speechless, from both his coaching/cheering during the race and the emotion of watching these five Explorers cruise up the river in winning fashion.

Sigmund, himself barely audible, could proclaim that "this was the best day of my crew life. To accomplish this with 1,000 alumni watching and to have them share the excitement was just an incredible experience."

Valenti, meanwhile, nursed his vocal chords back into working order and, a few days later, was able to explain what this all meant in the overall scope of La Salle crew.

"We had gone through the spring unbeaten," he said. "We won at the Johns Hopkins Invitational, the Cherry Blossom (in Washington) handily, and the La Salle Invitational, as well as in the Kerr and Bergin Cup races."

"But for La Salle to win the Dad Vail, an event in which La Salle crews of many years ago had done well . . . well, we hope it sparks interest from within the La Salle community, the alumni, and high school rowers who might be looking for a good school at which to continue their education and their career."

Actually, it was a strategic decision which paid off in victory.

"We only had four guys who were legitimate heavyweight rowers," Valenti said, "so we concentrated on the fours, rather than trying to put together an eight that might not fare as well."

It was, indeed, a decision that resulted in one of La Salle's shining athletic moments.

Meanwhile, still in the water . . . John Lyons completed his ninth season as the Explorers' swim coach in perfect style—MAAC championships in both men's and women's divisions to account for 20 points as La Salle rolled up a total of 111 and a 37½-point margin over a quartet of second-place finishers in the Commissioner's Cup derby.

Aside from his personal accomplishments, such as winning MAAC Coach of the Year and National Catholic Coach of the Year, Lyons had continued to build the swim programs into a position among the East's elite. And for several reasons.

"You need good recruiting, good people, some luck, and a great facility," Lyons said. "You have to make good swimmers want to come to a good program, and La Salle has a very good one, and an outstanding facility in Kirk Pool. We hope to keep improving so we can continue to compete with the best in the East."

Both men's and women's teams had success sprinkled all over them, including Lyons, Malachi Cunningham, the MAAC Women's Coach of the Year, and Chris Bergere, the MAAC and National Catholic Diving Coach of the Year.

To say the future is promising is almost trite, since there was a generous supply of underclassmen and women out there garnering honors—such as Cheryl Coppola, the MAAC's Outstanding Diver, and Karen Hafner, the MAAC's Outstanding Women Swimmer. Both were freshman.

And there was Eric Buhain, the senior freestyle/butterfly standout from the Philippines. His honors in-

Kelli McGahey (center), who was named to the 1990 Mid-Atlantic Regional All America team, is the younger sister of Kathy McGahey, '82, a member of the 1984 U.S. field hockey team that won a bronze medal at the 1984 Olympics.

La Salle underclassmen won the Frank Wetzler 4x400 before clude MAAC All-Academic, National Catholics Outstanding Swimmer, co-MAAC Outstanding Swimmer, and La Salle's best.

That was just this year. For the past, his resumé includes enough honors to reach from one end of the pool to another but among the most cherished is his competition in the 1988 Seoul Olympics as a member of the Philippine National Team.

That, and his string of honors, both academically and athletically, brought forth some national and local television coverage for the La Salle swim program.

No wonder. The 3.4 Finance Major senior won six gold medals at the MAAC's and his six MAAC all-time records, his third-team selection on the GTE All-Academic team, and his qualification for the 1990 NCAA's are merely the icing on his cake of achievements.

And, he has set high standards for future Explorer swimmers.

• • •

Meanwhile, back on land . . .

The race was the Frank Wetzler 4x400, named after a great La Salle track coach, and in whose name the Explorers' McCarthy Stadium track is named.

But this race wasn't on that track before a few hundred diehards. This was at the fabled Penn Relays at Franklin Field, a track and field meet that has, in its 97 years, attracted national and international stars of the highest magnitude.

So, this past April, when coach Jim Gulick's foursome of Chris Donato, John J. Hunter, Ed Kelleher and Mark McCall, racing before more than 40,000 track buffs, captured the race, it was a fitting highlight to an outstanding overall track and cross-country season.

And, as was the case with so many of La Salle's teams, all four runners were underclassmen, Kelleher a freshman and the other three sophomores.

Indoors, the men's track wrapped up victories in such prestigious meets as the Millrose Games in New York (4x800 and 4x400) and in the Vitalis Meet at the Meadowlands (a school record 7:36.68 in the 4x800).

With considerable help from assistants Phyllis Keyes and George "Bear" Williams, the Explorers captured the men's MAAC cross-country title and the men and women both finished second in indoor track. Along the way, three men and four women earned All-Academic honors among the cross-country performers, while sprinter Hunter was named All-East and distance star Tom Schwind was named National All-Catholic. Hunter (200 meters) and Fran Hoey (800) were men individual winners in the MAAC meet, Cheryl Coppola was named the outstanding diver in the MAAC.

and Laura Rigolizzo (400 meters) wore a women's crown as the Explorers finished second to Manhattan.

Because of their self-applied high standards of the past, both men's and women's basketball teams had what some would term "disappointing" seasons. But again, disappointing by virtue only of what had been accomplished in the recent past.

Perhaps John Miller, fifth-year coach of the women, expressed it best:

"In my 20 years of coaching basketball, I have never experienced a season quite like the one we had (in 1990-91).

"Even though the team experienced much adversity beyond our control, it was an extremely enjoyable season. It was very satisfying because the team pulled together when they could very easily have folded their tents."

What happened on their way to a 16-12 season and second-round elimination in the MAAC Tournament were injuries and illnesses. In fact, at one time just before the tournament, Miller was working with only seven players.

But a lot of the letdown was cushioned by the academic and athletic awards accorded Mary Greybush. The senior from Bethlehem, Pa., was named to the GTE Academic All-America third team, combining great stats on the court (19.5 points and 9.3 rebounds a game) with high classroom marks (3.32 in a double major of Biology and English).

Academic honors flourished on the men's side, too. As expected, junior forward Jack Hurd made his way onto such lists as the GTE Academic All-American (2nd team), MAAC All-Academic (first team) and honorable mention in Playboy's salute to academia.

Not quite as expected was the emergence on the court of a lightly-heralded sophomore named Jeff Neubauer, from Slidell, La. Pressed into a starting role at season's outset because of early disciplinary action against guard Randy Woods, Neubauer moved in like a veteran. After having played only a handful of minutes as a freshman, he started eight games as a replacement for Woods early and Doug Overton later when the senior captain and all-around star injured an ankle.

Besides his ultra-capable ball-handling (averaging only one turnover a game) Neubauer joined Hurd on the MAAC Academic team.

Despite the temporary loss—at different times—of the two key ingredients of its exciting and nationally-aware backcourt of Woods and Overton, La Salle kept alive its string of

0,000 track buffs at the fabled Penn Relays

MAAC titles, making it four in a row, even though the fourth had to be shared with Siena.

A second-round loss in the MAAC Tournament to St. Peter's kept the Explorers out of the NCAA Tournament for the first time since Lionel Simmons' freshman year. A bid to the National Invitation Tournament was forthcoming and La Salle's venture there lasted for one game, a 93-90 loss at the University of Massachusetts.

At one point, coach "Speedy" Morris' Blue and Gold had a 16-4 record. But a last-second loss to St. Peter's at the Philadelphia Civic Center set the stage for the late-season letdown which brought the final mark to 19-10.

Overton and Woods were voted to the MAAC All-Conference team and the Philadelphia Big 5 first team, while Woods made All-Tournament. Overton was also the MVP of the Explorers' championship run through Baylor and Idaho in Tokyo in the Daiwa Ball.

On a court of a different size and shape, there were interesting developments in women's volleyball. A new coach, a short-handed squad, a rugged schedule—all these produced a disappointing outlook. But first-year coach Arnie Rosenbaum, a hearty band of seven players and a response to that schedule brought surprising results.

The record will say 14 victories and 18 losses but a closer look can be revealing and positive.

"It was an unusual season," Rosenbaum said. "We were playing .500 at 10 and 10, then hit a flat streak (seven consecutive losses going into the MAAC Tournament). But the players responded, we went 4 and 1 in the tournament and finished second."

When Rosenbaum says players, he's talking six or seven, and even volleyball novices know you must have six on the court at any time. So, how does it work, under such conditions?

"First of all, I had good help from my assistant (Dave Schlosser) and the players from the men's club team were helpful when we needed players to fill out a scrimmage," Rosenbaum said.

With one year under his belt (he became coach on Aug. 23, 1990), Rosenbaum has plunged into the recruiting whirlwind and corraled some players who will help immediately and will be instrumental as the Explorers improve the program even more.

The unavoidable task of late coaching replacements also affected field hockey and baseball.

Tracey Griesbaum took over field hockey just prior to the season and only the brilliance of a player like sophomore Kelli McGahey helped the team put out a considerable effort in every game. She was voted to the perceived a great playing career at La Salle University, and, after the 1988 season, retired from coaching, a position he had held for 30 years. It was fitting his number should be honored.

But wait a minute. Wasn't that Gene McDonnell out there again this season, coaching the Explorers, but wearing number 7?

It was. After his two-season hiatus, McDonnell has returned to lead the La Salle diamond hunt. Taking over late in February, it took McDonnell and faithful assistant Steve Glammer a while to get things going. Six consecutive out-of-the-gate losses on a Florida trip provided an inauspicious start, but the team rallied from there Eric Buhain, shown with coach John Lyons, was the MAAC's outstanding swimmer three straight years and competed for the Philippine National team in the 1988 Seoul Olympics.

Mid-Atlantic Regional second team, after leading the Explorers with 13 goals. Three players—Gina Russo, Jen Miller and Melissa Schubert—were recognized on the College Field Hockey Coaches Association National Academic Team.

Co-Captains Schubert and Tracy Edwards earned praise for maintaining an orderly approach to the season until Griesbaum was named head coach.

About 19 months ago, Gene McDonnell's baseball uniform number 9 was retired. He had experienced a great playing career at La Salle University, and, after the 1988 season, retired from coaching, a position he had held for 30 years. It was fitting his number should be honored.

And why did McDonnell come back?

"I missed coaching baseball," he said. "When I heard the position was open, I became interested and when the opportunity arose to come home, I welcomed the chance."

And about that retired number 9?

"I'm going to speak to some higher-ups in the athletic department."

Mary McGrath became LaSalle's all-time "hit" softballer

McDonnell said, "and see about getting it out of retirement."

The La Salle softball team had won the MAAC title two straight years and, going into the tournament in Niagara Falls, was top-seeded. The Explorers played that way in their first two victories (over Siena and Niagara), then dropped two in a row to eventual champion Fairfield and runner-up Canisius and brought a disappointing finish to the season.

Individual honors abounded, especially in the case of Mary McGrath, who completed her Explorers' career as one of the school's most decorated athletes.

McGrath, in addition to playing a sterling center field, became La Salle's all-time "hit" softballer with 193, getting 56 more than previous record-holder Cecelia Campbell. McGrath finished with a .346 lifetime average and set three other career marks and four season records.

McGrath summed up the season thusly:

"We didn't do as well as we could have. Our record (29-18) included some big wins and some disappointing losses. But the program will get better because there are so many more quality players becoming available for college competition. Girls today start in grammar school and you can see their improvement, and La Salle should be able to get its share of those top players."

For coach Rick Pohlig, his 17-year career record is 298-224-2, and the ideal scenario would have been for the team to win those two games while capturing its third consecutive MAAC title. It wasn't to be.

Among the team leaders were junior pitcher Andrea Huck, with a 17-9 record, catcher Jennifer Cole, GTE District II All-Academic and MAAC All-Academic, and right fielder Kelli McGahey, MAAC All-Academic.

Coach Pat Farrell's men's soccer team, playing a schedule loaded with road games, finished 11-10-1, and again advanced to the championship game of the MAAC. Again, it was against the strong Loyola team and, again, the Explorers fell to the perennial power Greyhounds. With so many starters returning, and with an abundance of home matches, the Explorer booters are looking to further improvement.

Georg Montag was voted the outstanding player in Philadelphia's Soccer Seven and received second-mention on the National Soccer Coaches/Met Life All-American. Bob McCarthy and Sean Conroy made MAAC All-Academic, and goalkeeper Rich Scholer—he'll also be returning—finished with a 2.8 Goals Against Average.

Returnees also make the women's soccer outlook somewhat brighter than the 6-11-2 mark of last season. Sophomore goalie Sue Guba had five shutouts and a 1.76 GAA. Coach Betty Ann Kempf's leading scorer also was a sophomore, Linda Madeja, and the season ended on a good note, a 2-1 victory over Columbia.

SPORT SHORTS: Brian Shaw captured the Philadelphia Big 5 individual golf title, and he and Leon Kasperski were part of a breakthrough in NCAA competition. Previously, only teams were able to enter the qualifying rounds but through the efforts of La Salle coach Brian Nelson, individuals were permitted in this spring and Shaw and Kasperski competed. Kasperski, the lone senior on the squad, finished tied for 25th with 76-80-156. Shaw shot 81-77-158 and tied for 36th. Neither shot well enough to advance. ... New tennis coaches George Mecherly (men) and Joe Simon (women) spent considerable time re-organizing their programs and putting much effort into drawing more of the school's tennis alumni into those programs. The women finished 2-10 but Simon fielded a team with no seniors, so there is much hope for improvement. ... Mecherly's men's team rang up an 8-6 record and received MAAC singles' crowns from Rob Totalo and Dennis Christofer. And, as in so many of the sports, underclassmen played major roles. ... Ed Lawless, in his second year as wrestling coach, had two participants in the National Qualifying, Vinnie Ernst (158 pounds) and Chris Shalbert (126). Neither made it through the qualifying, but earlier in the season, Ernst, a junior, had earned the Outstanding Wrestler Award at the National Catholics at Notre Dame.

ROTC's Final March

By Robert S. Lyons, Jr., '61

After 41 "adventuristic" years, the University's Military Science Department has been deactivated

A colorful, time-honored tradition ended after 41 years on May 11 when La Salle's U.S. Army Reserve Officers Training Corps (ROTC) Explorer Battalion held its final commissioning and unit deactivation ceremony on campus.

Army officials announced last July that 50 ROTC units in 27 states—including seven in Pennsylvania—would be closed at the end of the 1990-91 academic year.

According to G. Kim Wincup, assistant Army Secretary for manpower and reserve affairs, the cutbacks were necessary because the Army intends to reduce its overall size (700,000) by 20 per cent over the next five years. "It's a pretty painful process for the Army," he explained. "But we just need fewer lieutenants to come on active duty."

Lt. Col. James H. Dent, a Vietnam veteran who commanded La Salle's ROTC unit since 1987, said that it was strictly a "management" decision. "It was purely based on trying to meet budget constraints," he said, "not necessarily fingering specific universities."

Since its inception in 1950, La Salle's ROTC produced about 1,000 new second lieutenants including (retired) Major General William F. Burns, '54, who served under President Reagan as director of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, and Robert C. Ames, '55, who headed the CIA's Office of Near East and South Asian Analysis. A member of the first four-year class to be commissioned, Burns returned to La Salle as an assistant professor of military science and tactics from 1962 to 1965. Ames was assassinated in the 1983 bombing of the U.S. Embassy in Beirut.

Times were considerably different in 1950. Indeed, when La Salle's cadets attended their first summer camp at Fort Sill, Oklahoma, they found that some of the field artillery was still horse and mule-mounted. Also, when that post World War II generation of young men volunteered for the ROTC, it appeared unlikely that the nation would become involved in military action in the foreseeable future. Within weeks, however, war exploded in Korea and permeated all thoughts and activities of the ROTC cadets for the next four years.

“LaSalle produced a very fine quality of officers”

About a dozen men with prior military service were the first La Salle graduates commissioned in 1952 after completing the two year advanced course. The first four-year ROTC class at La Salle started with 100 students. About 30 were commissioned in 1954.

General Burns recalls his ROTC unit marching in its first parade commemorating Armed Forces Day in 1951. Being Philadelphia's "junior" military unit, La Salle's battalion was not exactly assigned to a prime position. "We marched just behind the Valley Forge Military Academy horses which created its own problems," he said. "We quickly learned the problems of infantry versus mounted units."

Over the years, La Salle's ROTC—which primarily trained artillery officers—established itself as one of the highest quality units in the nation. This year, for example, La Salle had 27 cadets on ROTC scholarships. Last year, Temple University had 12. "We had great retention rates," says LTC Dent, who came to La Salle from the University of Michigan where he had served as recruiting officer. La Salle's retention rate was 84 per cent during Dent's tenure. At Michigan, a school with 50,000 students and 25,000 residents, the overall rate was 75 per cent.

La Salle's ROTC was also noted for its challenging training programs. "We probably did more adventurous-type, high-speed training than other schools," says Dent citing La Salle's use of helicopters to fly cadets on and off campus and its policy of training undergraduates with Reserve and National Guard units. Training options varied from such choices as Airborne at Fort Benning, Georgia, to Northern Warfare in Alaska, Jungle Warfare, and Russian Language School.

"La Salle produced a very fine quality of officer," says Dr. Robert T. Fallon, a professor of English on the university's faculty. Fallon, a graduate of the U.S. Military Academy, was a Lieutenant Colonel in command of La Salle's ROTC unit from 1966 to 1970, undoubtedly the stormiest period in the ROTC's history at the university. "I enjoyed working with all of those splendid young men," he added.

In 1951, the ROTC Basic Course became a requirement for all physically fit freshmen and sophomores without previous military service. In 1965, the requirement for attending the second year of military service was removed. In 1969 when anti-Vietnam War activism was at its peak, a four day campus sit-in involving some 300 students and faculty members triggered a campus-wide referendum that called for the end of mandatory ROTC for freshmen. The program became entirely voluntary that September and women were admitted as cadets when the university became coed in 1971.

"I have so many mixed feelings about that period," says Fallon. "The memories of that time are still vivid in my mind. The years were pretty exciting, they were challenging. There was conflict. There was a great deal of dialogue, a sort of mutual trust. Just keeping contact was important."

Fallon remembers one year when preparations were being made for the annual St. Barbara's Day parade when the entire detachment marched to nearby Holy Child Church for Mass. The leader of the anti-war activists sat in his office for a half hour discussing ways to allow both the march and demonstration to proceed without conflict. "There was a sort of a mutual trust," explained Fallon. "We both wanted the day to be entirely orderly, decent, and civil."

It was also decided that year to hold a separate commissioning ceremony in the Dan Rodden Theatre for 80 new officers on campus on the morning prior to commencement. Because of the strong anti-Vietnam War feelings, officials didn't know what to expect. But an enormous crowd showed up, spilling out of the theatre into the foyer and down the hall of the College Union. "I was a little taken aback by the silent majority," says Fallon. "My spirits rose on that day."

After Fallon's tour as PMST, he taught at the University of Pennsylvania, earned a doctorate in English from Columbia University, and joined La Salle's English Department faculty. Today he is one of the nation's leading authors and scholars on John Milton and past president of the Milton Society of America. He also teaches courses on Shakespeare and spent the past year writing another book on a National Endowment for the Humanities fellowship.

"The English Department was one of the hotbeds of anti-war activism," Fallon recalls. "For the previous two years I had been very visible on campus and was identified with the military. If an anti-war activist wanted to get angry about the war, he had a ready target. There I was. So moving in was a little dicey."

The strength of La Salle's ROTC, General Burns recalls, was its strong ethical and religious orientation.

"ROTC was never a dominant program at La Salle," he explained. "It was a military program in essentially a civilian institution. La Salle's spirit helped put things into perspective and helped to answer some of the questions people seem to be tied in knots over today—the ethics of military professionalism, problems of war and peace, and so on."

The Army's decision to close ROTC units like La Salle's is regrettable, says General Burns, because one of the program's strengths was its ability to keep the military in perspective.

"I'm not saying that we don't need a place like West Point," the General explained. "We certainly do. But right now West Point provides a minority of officers going into the Army and that's probably as it should be because you need mind diversity on the college campuses. I think La Salle helped to provide that."

Is the Army's decision to deactivate La Salle's ROTC unit absolutely final?

"You never say never," warns General Burns. "It's quite likely that the Army could come back to La Salle with hat in hand in the future and want to reestablish the program. That's been done at other institutions."

Cabinet Official Among Honorees at Commencement

The Secretary of Health and Human Services, the president of the nation's largest public employee union, and a prominent educational leader were honored at La Salle University's 128th Commencement May 12 at the Philadelphia Civic Center/Convention Hall.

Louis W. Sullivan, M.D., the Secretary of Health and Human Services, received an honorary doctor of humanities degree. Gerald W. McEntee, '56, international president of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees (AFSCME), AFL-CIO, was awarded an honorary doctor of laws degree. Sister

Alice Gallin, OSU, Ph.D., executive director of the Association of Catholic Colleges and Universities, was given an honorary doctor of humane letters degree.

Dr. Sullivan was sponsored for his degree by Morton S. Mandell, M.D., a member of La Salle's Board of Trustees.

McEntee's sponsor was Dr. Joseph F. Flubacher, secretary of the university's Board of Trustees. Sister Gallin was sponsored by Brother Colman Coogan, F.S.C., provincial of the Brothers of the Christian Schools and a trustee of the university.

La Salle University's Brother President Patrick Ellis, F.S.C., Ph.D., conferred bachelor's degrees on 1,012 men and women including 229 Evening Division students.

Another 148 men and women received master's degrees in business administration; 21 earned master's degrees in nursing; 20 were awarded master's degrees in bilingual/bicultural studies (Spanish); 18 received master's degrees in religious education; 17 earned master's degrees in pastoral counseling; 14 were the first to receive master's degrees in human services psychology; 11 were awarded master's degrees in education, and nine received master's degrees in organization/management.

Dr. Sullivan, who was honored as "one of America's most distinguished physicians, educators, and public servants," was appointed to the Cabinet by President George Bush in 1989.

He oversees the federal agency responsible for the major health, welfare, food and drug safety, medical research and income security programs serving the American people. He came to HHS from the Morehouse School of Medicine in his native Atlanta where he had been founding dean and director of that college's Medical Education Program.

McEntee was honored as "a man who with balance, aplomb and some considerable success has adapted the basic principles of the Leonine Doctrine on labor and management to our modern American economy."

He has served as international president of the 1.2 million member AFSCME, in Washington, D.C., since 1981. He previously had a distinguished career as a labor leader in Pennsylvania. Beginning in 1958 as an AFSCME organizer in Philadelphia, he became the successful architect of the major public sector drive to unionize Pennsylvania's 75,000 state employees.

A native of Philadelphia and a 1956 graduate of La Salle where he majored in economics, McEntee is a vice president of AFL-CIO and a member of its Executive Council.

Sister Gallin was honored for focusing "well-deserved attention on the role of religious women in American higher education" and for providing "thoughtful, forceful leadership during challenging times."

She is a member of the Order of St. Ursula and has been executive director of ACCU, an organization of more than 200 institutions, since 1980. Before that, she served as a teacher specializing in

Twin Sisters and Dad Graduate Together as One Delivers Student Commencement Address

When twin sisters Diane and Donna Brady of Furlong, Pa., started applying to colleges several years ago they hadn't planned to attend the same institution. Since they were interested in different fields they decided to go their separate ways. After all, they had attended the same schools all their lives.

Then La Salle University offered both of them a Christian Brothers scholarship and they decided to accept. Although each had her own reasons for choosing La Salle, there was one reason they both shared. Their father, John Brady, was also attending the university.

And now, four years later, on May 12,

Diane, Donna and John Brady, '60, graduated together. As if that's not enough to make the day special, Diane was chosen as the only student to speak at La Salle's commencement ceremony at Philadelphia's Civic Center/Convention Hall.

Born in Norristown, Diane and Donna were number five and six of the seven Brady children. They spent much of their lives in various parts of Canada due to John Brady's job with the Rohm and Haas Company. When they returned to this area they attended Lansdale Catholic High School, where they both graduated in 1987.

Although the women have always been close they decided to apply to different colleges because they wanted to pursue different careers. Diane was interested in law and Donna wanted to pursue medicine. However, after visiting La Salle's campus and being awarded scholarships, they decided to stay together for another four years.

"I always liked it here," Diane explained. "La Salle was the nicest school that accepted me. Donna visited it and she liked it too. I knew we made the right choice."

In the meantime, John, who has a bachelor's degree in chemistry, was taking an undergraduate course in psychology in preparation for entering La Salle's graduate program in Human Services Psychology.

"I encouraged the girls to come to La Salle because I knew that the small classes were much better than some other places with big classes. And I knew the interest the Brothers have in students. Their philosophy is just great, they are really interested in the students and the students do prosper here."

Of course being able to see his daughters every week was also an attractive prospect for the Rohm & Haas Distribution Safety Coordinator.

"It was neat being in school with the girls. I like the campus atmosphere and I almost always got to see them on Wednesday, before or after class. Often we'd have dinner together. We'd discuss classes or get feedback on papers. Diane helped me with doing computer searches in the library, something she was much more used to than I."

"Sometimes, while he was in class, I'd borrow the car to go shopping, or I'd give him my laundry," Diane added.

"Yes, they used the car lots of times," John continued. "There were times I'd come back from class, it would be raining and I'd be standing there looking for the car. Either they weren't back yet or they parked it somewhere else."

According to Donna, a biology major, having Dad take classes at La Salle came in handy even in the summer.

"It was nice having Dad here. The summer I worked in the Germantown Hospital Program as a lab technician, I was on campus the whole summer. I didn't have a car except when Dad was in class. I got to see him and pick up the car."

But attending the same college gave the Bradys more than the opportunity to share the car. It gave them the opportunity to grow and become even closer.

"We talked about lots of things," Donna added. "We'd talk about school and what was going on with our lives. Dad got to meet our friends and hear about things most parents with kids in college don't hear. It's much better to talk to someone in person than on the phone."

Diane agreed. "Having spent this time with Dad made us even closer," the political science major explained. "And you see him in a different light. You're both students. He's not telling you to do things like the dishes or take out the dog. He understands where you're coming from. This was a growing period for all of us."

In addition to sharing the college experiences and their lives with each other during this time, these Bradys also shared great pride in each other's accomplishments.

Diane expressed her pride in her father and his dedication to completing the Human Services Psychology Program and in watching him graduate among the first to complete this program.

"I'm so proud of him," she beamed. "It was so hectic, with working and school and family. It was so hard for him to fit everything in. But he did it."

And Donna and her father are beaming with pride over Diane's selection as commencement speaker, a goal the sisters have shared since high school.

"I'm really proud of both of them," John said. "They work hard. They've always worked hard and I've never really pushed them. They are real hustlers, they really do it themselves."

Perhaps it's no coincidence, then, considering the circumstances, that Diane's commencement speech carried the theme of "unity." She spoke about the unity that was created among class members throughout the last four years, how they grew, how they owe their success to each other and how they depended on each other's help to get through.

And with that in mind, it's no surprise that sharing this special day with each other is seen as a wonderful opportunity for these three Bradys.

As Diane put it: "It's great! I've always shared everything with other people. I heard in a sermon the other day 'You come into this life by yourself and you leave by yourself,' and I thought, I didn't. I came into life with someone else. I've shared all my birthdays, everything. And that's what makes it exciting. It's not that the focus is not on you. It's just makes it so much better!"

after 45 years as a teacher and 27 years as department chairman.

The fund will be used to underwrite the cost of "The Robert J. Courtney Award," which will be given annually to an individual for exemplary contributions to public service and/or exemplary scholarship in the fields of politics, law, and public administration.

Additionally, the fund will underwrite "The Robert J. Courtney Lecture." This will be an annual lecture held for alumni and delivered by a prominent figure in politics or a well known political scientist.

"Bob's numerous contributions to the department, the university, and the community are the enduring testimony of an outstanding teacher, scholar, and friend," said Kenneth L. Hill, chairman of the Political Science Department, in making the announcement.

"Whether Bob was lecturing, counseling students, or helping a colleague to resolve a problem, he had but one goal—to do what was right and to do it with integrity. For his students and his friends, Bob Courtney was the embodiment of the ideal professor. He encouraged us to search for truth, to strive to fulfill our potential, and to recognize and accept those limitations we are unable to transcend."

In 1989, Brother Ellis was among a select group of Americans who joined delegates from colleges and universities in discussing the Vatican's role in worldwide Catholic higher education with Pope John Paul II in Rome. He has traveled extensively to Europe, China, and the Middle East.

Born in Baltimore in 1928, Brother Ellis, a member of the Brothers of the Christian Schools since 1946, joined the La Salle staff in 1960 as an assistant professor of English. He has been at the university since then except for a term as principal of La Salle High School, in Miami, Florida from 1962 to 1964.

Brother Ellis returned to La Salle in 1964 and served as director of the university's Honors Program until 1969 when he was named director of development and vice president of the Corporation. Brother Ellis was awarded a Lindback Foundation Award for distinguished teaching in 1965 and currently holds the academic rank of Professor of English.

Brother Ellis served at Philadelphia's West Catholic High School for boys from 1951 to 1958 and again from 1959 to 1960 in various capacities including chairman of the English Department and guidance director.

Brother's most recent article, "Teaching Orders and the Efficacy of School," appeared in America. He is a member of Phi Beta Kappa and was president of the Phi Beta Kappa Association of Philadelphia for two terms.

Brother Ellis, a 1946 graduate of Baltimore's Calvert Hall College High School, received an A.B. degree in English from the Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C., in 1951. He earned a master's degree and doctorate in English from the University of Pennsylvania.

Student Exchange Program Inaugurated with Kiev University

Leysa Honchar, a sophomore literature major from the Ukraine, is the first student to participate in La Salle University's undergraduate student exchange program with Kiev University.

In addition to carrying a full course load at La Salle for the Spring 1991 semester, Leysa is studying Ukrainian emigre literature and church history at the Philadelphia Affiliate of the Ukrainian Catholic University in Rome, located in Elkins Park, and the Philadelphia branch of the Shevchenko Scientific Society of New York.

Ukrainian students participating in the program receive full tuition from La Salle and their living expenses are paid by the Ukrainian community of Greater Leysa describes La Salle as a "wonderful place with wonderful teachers." She is especially impressed with La Salle's "concentration on individual students." In her spare time, Leysa likes to go to La Salle's library and read the works of Jean Jacques Rousseau—a luxury that she has no time for in Kiev where her attention is focused on political protests.

"In Kiev, my first responsibility is to society," explains Leysa, who is the author of numerous articles that deal with the political upheaval in her homeland. "A lot of young people try to express themselves in this way."

Southeastern Asian Component Added To Graduate Program

La Salle University will offer a unique Southeast Asian component for its Graduate Master's Program in Bilingual/Bicultural Studies starting this September.

The principle objective of this new component is to develop linguistic and cultural skills for teachers and other urban professionals who work with the Southeast Asian community in Philadelphia.

According to Dr. Leonard Brownstein,

Leysa recently participated in a two week hunger strike against the Parliament's denial of several student requests. When the Parliament finally agreed to adopt the requests, Leysa remarked "it was the best day in my life."

After graduation, Leysa plans to become a journalist and the author of an historical novel.

Dr. Rudnytzky is now accepting applications from La Salle University students who have basic proficiency in Ukrainian and are interested in spending either one semester or one full academic year at Kiev University. Each candidate will receive full tuition, free living quarters and 250 rubles a month (approximately $375).

a professor of foreign languages and director of the program, there is no other component offered like this on the East coast.

This innovative 36 credit hour program will include five intensive language courses in Vietnamese or Khmer. The program consists of a special spring immersion course; courses on the history and culture of Southeast Asia; Vietnamese and Cambodian literature courses (in English translation); and workshops, symposia and a field experience involving Philadelphia's Asian community, with an emphasis on listening and speaking skills in Khmer and Vietnamese.

As in the Spanish program, students may wish to take courses in language and culture without seeking the master's degree.

For more information on the new Asian curriculum, contact Dr. Leonard Brownstein, or Gabriel Blanco, of La Salle's Master of Arts in Bilingual/Bicultural Studies Program at 951-1593.

In addition to the new courses, students will also take many of the regular graduate courses offered in La Salle's Bilingual/Bicultural Program. These include: the teaching of English to speakers of other languages; applied linguistics; strategies in developing cross-cultural communication; and the history and development of bilingual programs in the United States.

"The model for the program is based on our extremely successful Spanish program, which began nine years ago. Almost from the beginning people at La Salle, as well as those off-campus, have asked us to include some form of Asian study," Brownstein said.

"We contacted school systems, particularly the Philadelphia school system, to determine what were the largest percentages among the Asian ethnic groups. We discovered that they were Cambodians, who speak Khmer, and Vietnamese."

Brownstein feels that teachers, social workers, nurses and police officers will benefit the most from the study of the Southeast Asian community because it will allow them to work more effectively with Asians and get a better understanding of their language, culture and literature.

Specialists on Southeastern Asia will participate in the workshops and symposia, as well as teach the classes.

"Cocaine's Tiniest Victims" Discussed at Holroyd Lecture

Dr. Hallam Hurt, chairman of the Division of Neonatology at Albert Einstein Medical Center, discussed "Infants of Cocaine Users: Society's Tiniest Victims" at La Salle University's 12th annual Holroyd Lecture on April 26, in the Dan Rodden Theatre, on campus.

Immediately prior to Dr. Hurt's lecture, the Holroyd Award for distinguished service to health professions was presented to Dr. Charles J. Wolf, '65, who is chairman of the Department of Medicine at Pennsylvania Hospital. Dr. Wolf has served as chief of the section on renal disease at Pennsylvania Hospital since 1976.

The Holroyd Lecture is held annually to honor the memory of the late Dr. Roland Holroyd, professor emeritus and founder of the Biology Department at La Salle where he taught for 53 years. The event is co-sponsored by the university's School of Arts and Sciences and La Salle's Alumni Medical Association.

Previous Holroyd Lectures at La Salle have featured C. Everett Koop, former Surgeon General of the United States; Thomas E. ROTC Cross-Enrollment Agreement Announced

Although the university's Army ROTC program has been formally deactivated, current and future La Salle students will be able to continue participation in Army ROTC instruction and training through cross-enrollment at other detachments in the Philadelphia area.

Brother President Patrick Ellis, F.S.C.,

Ph.D., announced that a formal cross-enrollment agreement has been executed between La Salle University and the University of Pennsylvania's Army ROTC unit. Students are also free to choose to participate in other programs if they desire.

The agreement stipulates that eight semesters of instruction will be provided. The instruction will be essentially the same as what had been provided at La Salle. Uniforms and textbooks will continue to be provided at no cost to the enrolled students.

Students that qualify for Army ROTC scholarships will be able to continue attending La Salle University as their primary academic institution. Scholarship payments will be made to La Salle by the U.S. Army.

La Salle University will accept ROTC credits awarded by the Department of Military Science at the University of Pennsylvania and other schools. Those credits will be subject to the same requirements imposed on any other course work taken at other institutions.

REMEMBER WHAT MADE LA SALLE SO SPECIAL?

The LaSallian commitment to teaching and to the individual student is unique in higher education. But we don't have to tell you that. You experienced it firsthand.

Now it may be time to think about the right college for your children. Or a relative. Or the child of a friend. You should know, then, that our commitment is as strong as ever. And with higher education under attack for everything from abandoning its teaching mission to fostering an impersonal view of students, that commitment is one of our greatest strengths.

If you know someone who would benefit from the La Salle experience, please fill out the coupon below and send it to the Admissions Office, La Salle University, Philadelphia, PA 19141. Or call Brother Gerald Fitzgerald at 215-951-1500.

"It's a Buyer's Market"

La Salle is no longer a "street corner" college. It's now a distinguished regional university locked in an intensely competitive battle for students from New England to Florida

By Robert S. Lyons Jr., '61

Students at Freshmen Orientation: By the end of the century, more than 75 percent of them could be living on campus.

How times change!

College at La Salle for Ray Ricci and most of his classmates 25 years ago was a trolley or subway ride from neighborhoods like West Philadelphia, Mayfair, West Oak Lane, and, maybe Cheltenham.

A vast majority of Ricci's counterparts—85 per cent of them, in fact—came from one of 14 Philadelphia area high schools. La Salle was basically a street-corner commuter college in those days with less than 600 men living in a half dozen small dormitories on the other side of 20th and Olney. Most of the residents came from upstate Pennsylvania, South Jersey, or, perhaps, a Christian Brothers High School in Pittsburgh or Washington, D.C.

The Admissions Department in 1965 was a one man operation—the late Brother Christopher. So was Financial Aid with the late Brother Martin Stark dispensing small parcels of money literally out of a closet in College Hall.

Today, as La Salle has evolved into a distinguished regional university, fewer than 40 per cent of its undergraduates come from the Philadelphia area. Most of its

The competition is just incredible because we have far more colleges and universities and far fewer 18 year-olds men and women attended some 750 other high schools in 33 states and about 21 foreign countries. The number of students living on campus has tripled to more than 1,800. College officials, in fact, see the possibility of La Salle's freshmen class in the year 2000 being 75-80% residential. In addition to the traditional dormitories, there are now ultra-modern townhouses and beautiful apartments surrounding the 82 acre campus than now stretches for more than a mile.

La Salle, incidentally, is one of only a handful of colleges and universities in the nation that guarantees four years of housing to all admitted freshmen. "I don't know of any other college in the Delaware Valley that makes such a guarantee," says Brother Gerald Fitzgerald, who has been La Salle's director of admissions since 1978. "Most of them provide housing for a year or two, than you have to move off campus."

"La Salle's recruitment area has spread immeasurably over the last 25-30 years," explained Raymond A. Ricci, '67, who is completing his first year as the university's new vice president for enrollment services. "It's a much longer, much more drawn out, much more involved, and much more intensely competitive process. And it's far more expensive today than it was 30 years ago."

Ricci worked as the university's registrar for nine years, then became La Salle's director of planning in 1983. He now coordinates all aspects of recruitment and retention of students including admissions, advertising and promotion, financial aid, and institutional research. He also monitors student satisfaction and eventual student outcomes and is involved with publicity, career planning, and resident life as it relates to student recruitment.

Ricci has been with the university since 1967 when he joined the Evening Division as assistant registrar. He was named registrar in 1974, a position he describes "at the neck of the funnel" that served as an invaluable training ground for his current responsibilities.

"This background helped me get a sense of the inner workings of the campus," explained Ricci recently while sitting in his office in the historic Peale House overlooking the former Belfield farm. "It was a position where you saw every professor and virtually all of the students sometime over a four year period. It made me very sensitive to student and faculty needs."

Institutional research officially began at La Salle in the late 1970s although the Evening Division has been targeting demographically for some 20 years prior to that. The entire research process became more structured in 1980 as enrollment forecasting models became much more sophisticated and extensive surveys were conducted of students who dropped out or graduated.

Through institutional research, Ricci and his staff obtain demographic projections that identify new markets for potential students for the university. Officials can analyze such factors as parent's income, SAT scores, the family's educational background, and the student's academic/career preferences. They can even get an idea how mobile a family is and examine tendencies of students in a particular geographic area to go away to college or attend institutions closer to home. There are some pockets of areas in North Jersey, for example, where it probably wouldn't be economically feasible for La Salle to invest in recruitment because students simply don't leave that geographic area when they are looking for a college.

The highly elaborate system provides information for the entire nation but specifically keeps track of 65 geographic markets that comprise the Middle Atlantic states region—La Salle's primary recruitment target area. Compounding the problem, however, is the fact that in 1970 there were more than 4.3 million 18-year-olds. Today that number has dropped to 3.5 million but the number of colleges and universities has increased in that period from 2,600 to 3,150.

"The competition is just incredible," says Ricci. "Today we have far more colleges and universities and far fewer 18-year-olds. The demographics are going to continue to fall until the mid 1990s. Then the increase that we can see after 1995 is going to largely be in the minority population."

"It's very much a buyer's market," says Brother Fitzgerald, whose Admissions staff of seven professionals now participates in twice as many college nights and high school visits (about 700) than the university did 15 years ago. "We're out there explaining the reality of our university, stressing that we are very much a full-service Catholic university with a very strong emphasis on teaching as opposed to a research university."

In his recruiting travels up and down the East Coast, Brother Fitzgerald sees a familiar pattern—the primary appeal of La Salle remains the same: the traditional reputation of the Christian Brothers and the university's strong emphasis on teaching and personal attention. Other prominent selling points include La Salle's flexible curriculum—30 per cent of the incoming freshmen are undecided about their academic major—and the heavy emphasis on academic advisement, especially the new "Freshman Year Experience" course.

Both Ricci and Fitzgerald credit these factors with La Salle's extremely high retention rate that has drawn national recognition in the U.S. News and World Report rankings: about 65 percent of its full-time students graduate and 90 percent of its freshmen move up.

During his 12 years as Admissions Director, Brother

Brother Gerald Fitzgerald (standing) reviews admissions promotional material with Raymond A. Ricci (right) and Ray Ulmer.

La Salle's recruiting target radius has been expanded from the Delaware Valley Connecticut, New York, New Jersey

Fitzgerald has seen a significant improvement in the quality of students enrolled at the university. The typical La Salle student in the mid-1970s was in the top 3/5ths of his/her high school class and was scoring around 950 or better on the SATs. "That's gone up drastically," says Fitzgerald. Today the average SAT score of science students is in the mid 1100s while arts and business students average in the low 1000s. "Generally speaking, we want to see a pretty solid 'B' student," added Fitzgerald.

Basically, explains Brother Fitzgerald, he is looking for students who are "well-rounded," academically, socially, and in extracurricular activities. Students who score below 1000 on the College Boards are not automatically turned down. "It's simply one indicator," says Fitzgerald, adding that his staff puts much greater emphasis on the high school record. Other factors are considered including interests, and accomplishments as well as motivation of the student, letters of recommendation, and previous family association with the university.

Despite the intense competition for students, La Salle officials unanimously agree that compromising academic standards is absolutely out of the question. "Many of our competitors have dipped considerably with their academic requirements," says Brother Fitzgerald. "We have been very consistent in maintaining our standards. Any good, solid academic reputation that we've built up would simply be ruined by opening our doors to everyone."

Over the last half-dozen years, awareness of La Salle has increased steadily. In 1990-91 alone, the university received a record 31,000 requests for information from prospective freshmen. Applications and acceptances have increased as well, particularly from distant areas. New classes have been averaging 750 freshmen and 175 transfers. Those who were not accepted were not forgotten, however.

"We don't just say 'thank you, good-bye, see you later' to the person we turn down," says Brother Fitzgerald. "We try to have a very clear, understandable, rational explanation for everything we do. If they truly want to ultimately get here, we try to offer some kind of assistance. Maybe we'll advise them to attend their local community college. We'll even advise them about what courses to take. We ask them to keep us informed about how their courses are going."

The decline in the college-age population has also played a major role in the changing commuter picture at La Salle. So has the precarious economic situation. Ten years ago, for example, the Philadelphia Archdiocesan High Schools, traditionally the primary feeders for La Salle, graduated more than 12,000 students. This year they graduated 6,500 and the total is soon expected to dip below 6,000.

"We're becoming too expensive for the commuter population," says Dr. John Reardon, chairman of La

Salle's Accounting Department, who has been visiting local high schools for the past 20 years promoting the university. "There are so many poor students at some of these inner-city schools that you know that a La Salle education is not viable."

Reardon, who goes into the classrooms to speak to first-track students, has found more success recently in such nearby suburban schools as New Jersey's Paul VI, Abington and William Tennent High School, in Warm-minster. "Ten years ago, maybe two of their students would attend La Salle. Today we're getting eight."

"By and large today, even average income families are thinking in terms of sending their children away for the total college experience," says Ricci. "Proximity to home is still an important issue—30 years ago it was a trolley ride; today it's a two hour drive."

But there's also a greater tendency to choose low-cost public institutions like West Chester, Millersville or East Stroudsburg, where the entire package—room, board, tuition, and fees may be less than tuition at La Salle. That's why La Salle has increased its financial area to some 65 geographic markets extending from eastern Ohio to New England, northern Virginia, and Florida aid commitment dramatically while expanding its recruiting target radius from the five county Delaware Valley area to some 65 geographic markets extending from eastern Ohio to Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York state, New Jersey, northern Virginia, and Florida.

"Some areas along the eastern seaboard export a high number of students," says Ricci. "New Jersey, in general, is a leading exporter. So is Connecticut and Long Island. We have done very well in New England, especially the Boston suburbs."

No matter where the students come from, financial aid is a major factor in their higher education decision. Indeed, on a recent survey of students asking them why they decided not to attend La Salle, 64 per cent of them cited money as the main factor. "La Salle has come leaps and bounds in the last five years in terms of its commitment," says Wendy McLaughlin, the university's financial aid director. "It was smart of us to do it but if we hadn't, I don't know where we'd be in terms of Admissions Office numbers." In 1986, all of La Salle's grants-in-aid (less than $2 million) were awarded on the basis of merit or on a combination of merit and financial need. Last year, the university awarded $1.5 million on the basis of financial need alone and more than $5 million for all types of aid.

"We have to stay competitive," says McLaughlin, "because students still compare (financial aid) packages from different schools and attend the school that they can afford." Although the percentage (70%) of students receiving some kind of financial aid has not really changed over the years, the total amount of federal and state aid available has not kept pace with inflation and rising tuition. Last year, La Salle distributed $15 million in aid from all sources.

Part of the responsibility for spreading the gospel about La Salle to prospective students, so to speak, belongs to Ray Ulmer, the university's director of communications, who was hired five years ago to devise an advertising and marketing strategy, and produce guidebooks, viewbooks, and other promotional materials focusing on admissions. He spent the first few months on the job assessing La Salle's strengths and analyzing the perceived needs of the marketplace.

"Some of the examples that I came across when I first came here were just amazing to me," recalls Ulmer. "People just took for granted the kinds of things we did that made us special—the quality of our teaching and the personal attention we give. First of all, everybody (including all of the top administrators) around here teaches. Secondly, the people who do teach—they give out their phone numbers the first day of class."

Ulmer described how Brother James Muldoon, the university's dean of arts and sciences, likes to say, "yes, we have lecture halls but we don't use them. I don't see how you can teach in a lecture hall when each teacher should be able to look into the eye of every student. If you can't see past the fourth row, you can't see into the eyes of the student to know whether or not they need help." "It's almost poetic," says Ulmer, "to be able to look into the eyes of the student. That's really profound stuff that they take for granted. But, indeed, that's what this place does best—that special kind of teaching and our relationship with students."

In addition to establishing the fact that La Salle is a top-ranked institution, Ulmer must compete with a very limited budget in the marketing battle for students who have the money and the credentials to go elsewhere. High school students with the better credentials are virtually inundated with beautiful, glossy promotional materials from as many as 500 institutions, some of them resembling extravagant full-color corporate annual reports. "These books seem as a way of establishing brand names," says Ulmer. "Students and parents want to feel that they're buying into excellence."

La Salle's total budget for promotional recruitment is about $364,000 with a little less than half of that devoted to advertising. Temple University's budget for advertising alone is $1.2 million. A few months ago, when Temple's enrollment dropped drastically because of labor problems, the university spent $500,000 to run five weeks worth of Bill Cosby radio and TV recruiting spots.

Ulmer has devised a series of innovative approaches in an attempt to reach high school prospects. Some 65,000 posters describing the university in a whimsical fashion, produced by David McShain, '88, have elicited a positive response. "No matter how many pieces of mail you get, you just cannot ignore a tube," says Ulmer.

Also in the works is a series of advertisements with New Yorker type of cartoons targeted for high school newspapers. "We are not going to be as heavy-handed as we would in an advertisement on, say, an Op-Ed page," explains Ulmer. "We want to reach students in a lighter vein talking about the quality of teaching." Ulmer acknowledges that the high school students are facing a "very serious" decision about college. "But we want them to understand that we expect that this whole process can also be fun. And there are institutions that offer the kind of education that you need but are also fun."

Both Ricci and Fitzgerald acknowledge the importance of continually attracting the sons and daughters of alumni. As Fitzgerald says, "The university contains an awful lot of the values it had when these parents were La Salle students. Much has changed about the university but the important things about the faculty and the teaching environment are still the same."

"We have 3,500 mostly happy campers on the place in any given semester," said Ricci. "Half live here eight months a year and most of them will tell you that this is a good place to be."

Honor Roll of Donors

Richard A. Edwards (center), senior vice president of the Council for the Advancement and Support of Education, presents Dr. Fred J. Foley, Jr., vice president for development, and Brother Charles E. Gresh, F.S.C., director of development, with one of the 1991 Achievement in Mobilizing Support awards. The award, which was co-sponsored by CASE and the USX Foundation, Incorporated, recognized La Salle University for achieving Special Recognition for Individual Program Effort through its Annual Fund Program.

Dear Friends:

It is my pleasure to introduce the 1990-91 Honor Roll of Donors by expressing the collective thanks of the entire La Salle community to the many individuals and organizations whose continuing loyalty and generosity have contributed to the quality of the education the University provides.

Despite the challenges posed by the recession and the multiplication of competing fund-raising campaigns, 1990-91 proved to be a very good year for La Salle University's overall Development effort. In July, the Council for the Advancement and Support of Education and the USX Foundation cited La Salle's Annual Fund Program for Special Recognition and presented the University with one of the 1991 Achievement in Mobilizing Support Awards.

Among the many accomplishments that are documented in the Honor Roll of Donors, the following highlights warrant special mention:

- (1) Total gifts, grants, and contracts amounted to $4,270,415.
- (2) 6,538 graduates contributed $1,330,673 to the Alumni Annual Fund, while 761 Parents of our current undergraduates donated $48,662 to the Parents' Fund. Both of these totals include the corporate matching gifts that the donors generated.

(3) Through the outstanding leadership of the Reunion Class Gift Committees and their respective Chairs, Reunion Giving topped the $240,000 mark, the highest total in the University's history.

(4) Business Matching Gifts increased by 2.2% and attained an all-time high of $162,560.

THE CHRISTIAN BROTHERS

The Christian Brothers' unwavering devotion, guidance and love for La Salle University has been truly their hallmark since inception. Like their founder, St. John Baptist De La Salle, patron of the University, the Brothers have committed their lives to education.

These religious who serve as faculty, administrators, and staff members have contributed $216,554 to the University in fiscal 1991 for scholarship assistance. La Salle students have been blessed with their influence for 128 years.

IN-KIND CONTRIBUTIONS OF PERSONAL PROPERTY

During the 1991 fiscal year, a number of individuals, corporations and other organizations generously donated gifts of tangible personal property and/or in-kind services to La Salle University. These gifts have served to benefit the total La Salle community, including the University's Alumni Office, Art Museum, Athletic Department, Development Office, and Duplicating Department/Print Shop. La Salle University is especially grateful to its many benefactors and friends for their loyalty and support.

Mr. and Mrs. Joseph G. Markmann share a light-hearted moment with Arthur C. Stanley, director of planned giving, and Brother Lawrence Oelschlagel, F.S.C., prior to the President's Dinner for members of the Charter Club, University Club, De La Salle Society, and San Miguel Club. For the past several years, Mr. Markmann has spearheaded La Salle's campaign to endow a chair within the Accounting Department, and the principal invested in that fund now exceeds $660,000.

MEMORIAL GIFTS

Some of the most meaningful gifts the Annual Fund Office receives are made in honor or in memory of a beloved friend, colleague, or family member. This year, such gifts were made in the names of thirty-eight (38) individuals, an inspiring indication of the donors' regard for both the University and the individuals named. We are honored to accept these special gifts.

Reunion Giving 1991

Over 1,200 graduates participated in the 1991 Reunion Gift Program, and they cumulatively contributed more than $230,000 to the University's Annual Fund. For several years now, La Salle has placed a special emphasis on gifts from the reunion classes, and the results have been quite encouraging. The University hopes that the classes that will celebrate their reunions in May, 1992 will take up the challenge and work to surpass the giving records of the classes that have preceded them!

"Pete The Barber" Celebrates Golden Anniversary at La Salle

"Pete the Barber" with his old friend Jack McCloskey.

The pompadour, the d.a., the bob, crew cut, ponytail, are any of these names familiar? To La Salle's Pete Paranzino, otherwise known as "Pete the Barber," these names are more than just familiar, they have determined the highs and lows of his professional life for over 50 years.

Pete has been cutting hair at La Salle since 1940, when he opened his shop on campus to cut the hair of the Christian Brothers. Since then he has trimmed, cut and shaved the hair and faces of countless faculty, students, alumni and administrators as well as the Brothers.

He was born in South Philadelphia 77 years ago the oldest of five children. After his father's tragic death, Pete had to quit school at the age of 12 and help support his mother and four sisters. He learned to be a barber at his uncle's North Philadelphia shop for $.25 a clip.

At that time La Salle College and High School were located a few blocks away from the barbershop. Many of the Christian Brothers came to Pete for haircuts. In 1929 when the college moved to its present location, Pete started making house calls.

For 11 years Pete worked for his uncle by day and cut the Brothers' hair by night. In 1940 he opened his own shop on the campus and he's been there ever since.

Through the more than half century he's been at La Salle, Pete has seen many hairstyles come and go but none were as frustrating for him as the styles of the 60's. That's when long hair was "in" and the barber was the enemy. "When the boys were wearing long hair, the barber was the bad guy," Pete explained. "I got very few students in my shop in those days, but I was able to keep my head above water with the Brothers, alumni and faculty.

"In those days the only time a student would come to me was when he had a job interview. And then he'd be afraid I'd take too much off. I kept a sign in the window that said 'Keep La Salle beautiful, keep your hair trimmed.'"

But as shorter hair styles came back, so did Pete's business. Today, he often cuts the hair of third generation La Salle students.

One of his early customers, who still comes to him, is La Salle's assistant to the vice president of development, John McCloskey.

"I haven't had a haircut from anyone else but Pete for almost 50 years," McCloskey said.

"I go to Pete for more than the haircut. It's the time in the chair, the conversation. We never run out of things to talk about. Before we would talk about our kids. Now we talk about our grandchildren.

In the beginning a campus haircut cost 75 cents. Today it cost $5.00. Not a bad price for a cut and conversation.

"I try to keep my prices low because the average student here is from a working class background," Pete said. "I'm a depression baby myself, so I think about it when I raise my prices."

Obviously at $5 a cut Pete isn't raking in big bucks each week. And considering the inconvenience of taking public transportation from his home in South Philadelphia to get to La Salle each day, you have to wonder why he's still at it.

But according to "Pete the Barber" it's all worth it.

"I like being with the students," he explained. "I'm very happy here. I've met lots of people and made many friends. As long as I've got health, I have no plans to retire. For me, to retire is to die, and I'm not ready for that."

Brother Richard Duerr to Receive Alumni Association's 50th Signum Fidei Medal

The Signum Fidei medal, the alumni association's most prestigious award, will be presented for the fiftieth time at the annual Awards dinner at 8 p.m. on November 22 to Brother Richard Duerr, F.S.C., for his outstanding work in the Philippines, it was announced by Marianne Salmon Gauss, '75, president of the Alumni Association.

Brother Richard, a native of Brooklyn, N.Y., devoted 30 of his 55 years as a Brother of the Christian Schools in distinguished service to the people of the Philippine Islands. He served there in various capacities—from teacher of high school chemistry to president of De La Salle College (now University) in Manila from 1961 to 1967.

Brother Richard was the founder of the Philippine Accreditation Association for Schools, Colleges and Universities (PAASCU) which corresponds to the U.S. Middle States Association of Colleges and Secondary Schools; he provided leadership in the creation of a Graduate Education Department, which has proven invaluable to Philippine education; and (perhaps most significant to his "sign of faith") he started St. Theresa's High School for children of the lepers at the segregated Leper Colony at Tala on the outskirts of Manila.

This will be the third time in the history of the Signum Fidei that the medal will be awarded to a Christian Brother. Brother E. Anselm, F.S.C. received the first award in 1942, and in 1988 Brother Patrick Ellis, F.S.C., Ph.D., President of the University, was the recipient.

The medal derives its name from the motto of the Brothers of the Christian Schools—"sign of faith," and is given to recognize personal achievement in harmony with the established aims of La Salle University. It is conferred each year on an individual who has made "most noteworthy contributions to the advancement of humanitarian principles in keeping with the Judeo-Christian tradition."

Membership in the Alumni Honor Society of Alpha Epsilon will be conferred on selected members of the Class of '92 at the dinner in the Union Ballroom.

Tickets for the dinner are $20.00 per person and may be purchased at the Alumni Office, first floor, Benilde Hall. Mail requests, accompanied by a check payable to La Salle University, should be received by November 15.

Breaking New Ground as Alumni Association President

When Marianne Gauss '75, MBA '87, entered La Salle in 1971 as one of the first women to do so, she knew she was breaking new ground for the university.

Twenty years later, as Marianne was elected the first female president of La Salle's Alumni Association, she has found herself breaking new ground again. As far as she is concerned, it's quite a responsibility.

"I feel a lot of responsibility because I'm the first woman," said the La Salle management instructor. "I want to set a good example, but I also don't want it to be divisive."

"It took a long time to have a woman elected, and there still is a large group on the Board that attended La Salle when there were no women here. It may never be the same, and that's probably good. I want them to understand that it's probably good, not negative. I want to make sure the Alumni Association remains an association for everyone."

An active member since she graduated, Marianne has served on numerous committees and positions of the Alumni Association Board including vice president and treasurer.

She has remained active in the Association throughout her professional career which included positions as a commercial loan analyst and internal auditor at Provident National Bank. She also credits her involvement in the Alumni Association for keeping her sane while she stayed home to raise her three children, Regina, 13, Patricia, 11, and Matthew, 9.

"For a while there the Alumni Association was part of my sanity," said the Fox Chase resident, whose husband, Siegfried, is also a La Salle alumnus, class of 1974. "It was the one place I could still be an adult when I was doing diapers. Through all those years this was the one place where they didn't treat me like I was losing my mind."

Now that she is president she plans to continue some of the work former president Steven McGonigle started, particularly the special target programs. These programs target different groups of alumni with a common interest such as women, minorities, and individual athletic teams to form affinity groups.

"When you go through La Salle you make friends in certain ways," explained Gauss, a Philadelphia native. "Calling everybody back because they graduated the same year may not get their attention. We're not homogeneous, and there's no way you can plan one function that can satisfy everyone. Creating affinity groups may help. That would be my major area of interest."

She also plans to continue her work with the alumnae luncheons and hopes to plan events highlighting women's issues.

"There are things that happen in a female life that are different than what happens in a male life. I'd like to see a network where a 25-year-old woman who is going through some of the various stages in her personal and professional life knows that there's somebody else here to talk to who has been through it."

Gauss also has very definite ideas of the role alumni should play in the university and how they can affect today's students. As a teacher on La Salle's campus she is probably more sensitive to the needs of students than most past presidents. She feels there are three ways alumni can help.

First she believes the alumni should be good examples. They should work hard in the community and the kind of people to whom La Salle can be proud.

They should be good contributors, if financially possible, especially given the cutbacks in federal funding.

And finally, alumni should be mentors. "I don't think you can discount that," she said. "Students need to know that somebody else sat in that desk and has made it. Made it at a lot of different levels, not just financially, but that they've made a successful happy life for themselves. I would like to see the alumni doing more of that. After all today's students are tomorrow's alumni."
